club owners closed their 1923 conference today. Three deals involving acquisition of highly touted league stars were the net results of practically continuous bartering efforts. No inter-league deals figured in the limelight.

Meanwhile reports circulated that the Yankees, as an alternative, or possibly an adjunct to a Chicago deal, had offered the unprecedented sum of $175,000 for Shortstop Joe Boley of the Baltimore International League club, Manager Miller Huggins of the Yankees denied any deal for Boley.

Jack Dunn, Baltimore owner, who is understood to have agreed to sell two or more of his stars to equalize playing strength among International League clubs, intimated that the choice of players from whom two would be disposed of rested among Merwin Jacobson, outfielder; Jim McAvoy, catcher, and Max Bishop, second baseman. the rink, and then the squads may have Emory "Topper" Rigney is the only recruit of the spring of 1922 who earned a regular job on the infield or outfield of an American League team last season.

Rigney, reporting to Manager Ty Cobb of the Detroit team last spring, started the season at shortstop and played every game of the season.

To make the record of this recruit the more remarkable, Rigney batted 300.

Only two players in the American League played 455 games last season. The other one was "Chick" Galloway of the Philadelphia Athletics and, stranger still, Rigney and Galloway are regarded as the best two shortsteps on the American League circuit.

Striking the bunker, the ball took a reverse the book and settled into the right pocket of the sweater which Moore was wearing, the weather being a triffectool.

The match was for blood, and Moore's opponent insisted that the ball must be played from where it lies. Moore, of course, insisted such a thing was impossible. His opponent good-naturedly insisted there was nothing to prevent him from removing his sweater, placing it on the ground, and driving the ball out of the pocket. The contest was halted, while Dekk White, the club professional, was summoted. He ruled that Moore had the right to drop the ball back and take a stroke penalty because of an unplayable lie.

Unquestionably the play is without precedent, None of the Cleveland professionals said they ever heard of such a thing as a ball settling in the pocket of the sweater of the player doing the driving.
