a lively little Parisian.

TALE OF THE LATIN QUARTER.

"Bon soir, Bibl," cried half a dozen of sorbonne students, as one December evening we went swinging along the large white students, as one December the large with the students of Paris, and so I have a friend in Dresden who gets the money on my signature and onlevard St. Michel.

"Bon soir, Messieurs," came back the forwards it to me here. Good joke, isn't suswer from a young girl with short it? Go on, Charlie." cropped hair and a pair of steady, obser-

"Shall we see you to night?" said I.

"Oh, yes," replied Bibi, "I shall overable haul you somewhere. Isn't that beautiful!" and she drew from her muff a bottle of spirit in which an ugly bit of human gists.

"Good night," he said, as he at last tore en hour's study with the microscope, and "I'll come for you, petite," said Octave, himself away and stepped out upon the "No, you won't," answered Bib!,
"Of course, not, for I shall claim the bonor of bringing Bibi to the ball." This polite tender came from Manuel, a dashing Spaniard, who had great, sleepy eyes which were dangerous whenever they chanced to wake.

"Will you?" Bibi returned, defiantly.

"Nonsense, Bibi will come with me, and we shall talk English together," said Arthur Kent, the slender, handsome young Englishman who had a room near mine chez la sirene, or, in other words, at Madame Aline's very old, tumble-down bonor of bringing Bibi to the ball." This

"Ill with neither," she answered, "and I won't even speak to you, monster," and while making a little krimace at her jealous lover, she caught Arthur's arm. The two went at a great rate, the rest of us following, until we all brought up at a table in "Lee Quatre grenadiers."

"Beer!" shouted Octave.

"Beer!" shouted Octave.

"Au diable with your beer," shouted Arthur much louder and elapping a Napolson on the table. "Champagne, Law, "Seedy Thespian "Supe, sir! How dare you call me supe? I'm the first old man of the company."
