ment, and whatever is below remains hidder. Mind, I don't say she hats anything to hide, but if she had she would know how to hide it. She's a elever girl, Frank, and I wouldn't comnt too securely on the covoted 'Yes' untilwell, until it is actually spoken."
"All must take their leap in the dark; why should not I? Ihut, Larry; if you don't mean to propose to Mario -and, by Jove, how you c:un look at her and not fall madly in love with her is what I cannot understand. Do you intend to propese to-".
"My Baby;" says Mr. Longworth, placidly, but with a certain decision of tone that the other understands; "as Mr. Guppy says, 'there are chords in the human heart,' and it is not for tall boys to make them rabate. 1 hare told you I am 1 .ot going to offer myself. to Mademoiselle Marie-that is sufticient for you. Now let us return, for I presume you hare finished with me for the present, and I am due at Madame Windsor's."
"So am I. Croquel, isn't it?"
And then Mr. Dexter resumes his oars, and with a face of cloudless radiance rows to land.

This same sunny afternoon, buta fow hours earlier, has seen Miss Hariottand Bdalle. Reine walking slowly through the hot and dusty streets of North Baymouth, the din of the huge throbbing machinery in their ears, its grit and grime in their eyes. The narrow strects in this part of the town lie baking in the breezeless heat; matrons sit at their doors, children in swarms trip up the unwary pedestian on the parement. Reine goes with Miss Hatiolt rery often now, and the dark French face is nearly as well known as Lady Bountiful's own.

Miss Hariott makes a call to-day she has never made with Reine before. It takes her to a tall tenement-house, and up three pairs of stairs, into a room tidy and comfortable, the floor carpeled, the windows curtained, a canary singing in one, flowers filling the oblier. A girl sits in a low rocker sewing; a very old woman is neading biscuits in a pantry. The girl rises with an enger smile, and, as she turns to greet her visitors, Reine sees with a chrill of horror that she is blind.
"I thonght you had forgotten us, Mis Hariott," the blind rirl salys, brighty. "Grandmother has been wondering if you were gone for another Europenn trip. Gran, hore is Miss Harioth at hast. You must exeuse her, please; she grows deafer every day."
"I have brought a fuend to see you, Emily," says Siss Latiot, taking a chair. "My friend, Emily JohnstonDademoiselio Reine Landelle."
"Ah! ma'amsello"-the blind girl holds out her hand, and turns so directIy to Reine that it almost startles her-- 1 am glad to sec you. I can't really see you, you know, but 1 always say that. I have heard of you so much."
"Heard of me!" Reine repeats.
"Why, yes," says Emily, laughing. "You go about with Miss Ilariott, don't you? and the people drop in and talk about the French young lady with the prelty ways, and sweet voice, and kind words for erery une. And when Mr. Longworth comes I ask him no end of questions. Bless youl we've sat and chatted about you by the hour. He doesn't stan it himself you know, but he answers my questions. And l'm sure I hope you'll come often."

Miss Rmily Johnston, having lost the use of her oyes, has by no means lost the use of her tongue, and chats away with a vivacious volability not infrequent in the blind. She holds up the work she is busy apon-a sheet, Reine sees.
"The first half-dozen nearly done, Miss Harioth," she says. "You may send me some more whenever you like. Mr. Longworth gave me a dozen handkerchiefs to hem for him the other day, so I have sewing enough for the present. Ma'amselle Reine, how do you like Baymouth?"
Mademoiselle answers, more and more puzzed. They rise and go prosently, and the blind grin shakes hands with both, and presses " ma'amselle" to come again with a frank cordiality there is no rosisting.
"Woll?" Miss Hariott says, when they aro in the strect, and smiles at Reine's puzzled face. "You would Chink she had not a care in the world, and for the last two yours she has been as you sce, stone blind,"
"Who is she? How was it? Why
