I. EDUCATION

- Since education is deemed the key to understanding the negative effects of hate, pornography and other offensive materials, special efforts should be made towards a meaningful education of users.
- Audio-visual materials (video and/or CD-ROM) similar to the ADL video "Crimes of Hate" should be developed that emphasize victim impact of hate propaganda, with testimony by victims of hate, racism, anti-Semitism, etc.
- Support - with funding, research, networking, etc. - the work of non-profit anti-hate and activists/networks. The objective in part is to counter hate with large amounts of credible information.
- Government schools and organizations should continue producing non-internet anti-hate, anti-racist educational materials and initiatives.
- Courses should be provided in school on media and computer literacy, including strategies to recognize bias and hate propaganda. Anti-racism training should be offered to all teachers and administrators.
- Training should be offered to users in order to assess potentially dangerous websites, to identify and report misuses of the Internet.
- Encourage governments to establish comprehensive media literacy programs as a required part of school curricula which teach young persons how to distinguish between legitimate and pseudo-scholarly sites; create a more general human rights awareness, encourage young people to be responsible media users.
