Sir Arthur M. Currie, President
McGill University,
Montreal, Canada.

Dear Sir:-

By the very practical and economical method described in the enclosed circular, the Modern Language Association of America is supplying teachers in its field with research materials which enable them to develop or continue their creative scholarship and thereby increase their efficiency in serving the institutions with which they are, or will be, connected. The Association was led to undertake this service because many institutions cannot afford to supply their faculty with the manuscripts and books needed for their research and much less pay them the salaries which would enable them to procure this material for themselves or go abroad in search of it. Any properly accredited teacher of modern languages may use our reproductions whether he be, or be not, a member of the Association.

To finance this enterprise the Association asks annually a relatively nominal contribution on the part of American Colleges and Universities of twenty-five dollars. We do not believe that any institution which is interested in higher education can make a more profitable investment of its funds. Much is constantly being done, and at considerable expense, for the comfort, the convenience and even the entertainment of students; this request merely asks for a comparatively small outlay which will enable us to supply a very vital need of a considerable portion of the teaching staff.

Very truly yours,

COLBERT SEARLES.
