particular instance of founding a new University, to serve a great and expanding national purpose, it would be mere prudence to take account of the experience of others, and, at all events, to avoid at the beginning the imposition of limitations and conditions which in a generation or less will prove mere hindrances to the full realisation of that purpose."

Dr. J. G. Adam is the Professor of Pathology at the University of McGill. In various capacities he has been connected with the University of Manchester, with Cambridge University and with the University of McGill. His experience with universities, and with the teaching of medicine, is, consequently, a wide one. He believes that "the university should be established somewhere between eight and twenty miles from a large city." The university should be no nearer to the city than this because, among other reasons, it is necessary to allow full space for the growth of the city and for the expansion which the future will inevitably bring to a university serving a progressive Canadian community.

He approaches the discussion of the relative merits of urban and suburban sites from the standpoint of the individual student, since the deciding factor in selecting the site for a new university should be: "Which is likely to provide the better citizen, the more useful man to the community a city or a country university?" He writes: "It is not the extent of a man's knowledge that makes the good citizen but the capacity to utilize that knowledge for the common weal." Dr. Adami is certain that the man who makes the best citizen is the one who most fully imbibes the university or collective spirit as distinct from the individual spirit. "That spirit is gained most surely when the university is situated away from a large centre of population with all its disturbing interests." He recognises that the subjects of the professional faculties can be taught only in a large city, but he believes that the professional schools can be sufficiently attached to their parent university if the university be situated at no greater distance than eight to twenty
