DOLLY'S HUSBAND.

"So this is the realization of my youth's brightest dreams!" said Martin Daleford to himself. He had just returned from a six years' abs in the golden regions of California, for a brief visit to the home of his boyhood. He had gone away a crude, ambitious, vaguely dreaming boy; returned a grave, heavy-bearded man, with wrinkles between his brows and a something of sternness about his firm lips. Nor #45 he the only person who had passed through the relentless cru cible of change during these six years.

Dolly Markman had changed too. She ha innocent, fair-halfed girl with lipe like dew-sprinkled roses, and blue, marvelling eyes, when Martin Daleford went away. But she had passed a winter in Boston since, and learned city forg regard the change as an improvement. She frizzled her golden hair now and work tawdry rings bend, and lisped slightly as she talked, and instead of the hearty kiss which he expected, she had when first he had entered after that long abeen

Well, Dolly, he said, how is it; are you going back to California next month?

Dolly looked down and hesitated, slooked up and twisted the corner of her apron into a knot. Well, persisted Daleford.

You—you are very sudden, lisped Dolly.
Sudden! Not at all, said Martin, I thought had been settled for the last six years.
But I was such a child then, pleaded Dolly You are a woman how, coolly answered Martin Daleford, and the matter is open for you to decide.
