BRITISH PARLIAMENTARIANS ASSERT MARKED FECULIARITIES.

bury, Lord Rosebery, the Duke of Devenshire and Mr. Chamberlain-A Very Racy Incident Anent the Duke

There is hardly a man in parliament-at least, among those assert marked peculiarity—some little trick of speech, which serves to distinguish him from others, and which, in most cases, acts as an index to his personal disposition and character, writes Livingstone Black in The Royal Magazine. Lord Salisbury is no exception to this rule. Broadly speaking, his peculiarity consists in the fact, that seated he is one man, and delivering a speech quite another. A deaf person would be sure to find Lord Salisbury's orations singularly unsatisfying, the language of gesture being in his case almost absent. He says the nastidex to his personal disposition and lmost absent. He says the nastiest and most crushing things about an opponent without altering his at-titude one iota; a mere inflection of his voice being the only sign of his spoken satire—none the less cutting, by the way, because it falls from the lips of a statue. All the time he stands with bent head, and hands hanging loose at his sides, or clasp-ed behind his rounded back. When seated Lord Salisbury loses much of this sangiroid, and sometimes ap-pears very nervous indeed. He has a curious habit of working his knees up and down, as if he were treading water. He has been noticed to do this for hours at a stretch. The voice of the Premier is musical, and his delivery in general excellent, but he has one singular defect for so great a speaker. Now and again he lapses into a style suggestive rather of talking to himself than addressing than addressing the House, and he then becomes inaudible to the reporters' gallery. But, if Lord Salisbury divides his time between calmness and perturba tion, the same cannot be said of his colleague, the Duke of Devonshire. The Duke cannot be betrayed into The Duke cannot be betrayed into anything like unseemly haste or overweening anxiety. He is the "Weary Will" of the House. When not actually engaged in a speech he is lying about in all directions. Apparently, lowever, the essence of the debate mingles with his dreams, for he always has a good grasp of the sub-ject when it comes to his turn to But it is patent that the whole thing bores him awfully-his own speeches, perhaps, most of all-if we may judge by the yawns with which they are punctuated.

Lord Rosebery resembles the Premier inasmuch as he has two distinct manners, one for the House and one for the platform. In the House lat-terly he has seemed to try to con-trol himself, to keep down his natural tendency for gesticulation. But he must have something to do with his hands, and he has taken to folding and unfolding, to turning and twisting a piece of ribbon. be feared this new diversion will not last him long, but that he will re-turn to his former trick of thumping nces the noble the table as he den lords opposite. On the platform, or at public dinners, Lord Rosebery lets himself go, so to speak. It is only the very rich who can afford to dress shabbily, and not even the rich do so without paying certain penalties. The Duke of Nor folk has the distinction of being th The Duke of Nor most carclessly dressed among Peers. This matters not at all, of course, so long as His Grace is known; no one thinks of a nobleman's clothes. But with strangers it is different. With characteristic kindness the Duke threw open his grounds at Arundel Castle to the public, but in doing so he did not bargain to be ordered off his own grass. Two Irishwoman, who were taking an airing in the park, noticing a shabbily dressed man turn of the pathway and take a bee-line across a strip of the grounds, were very indignant at witnessing, as they thought, so flagrant a breach of hospitality. "Hi! come back here, come back here!" they cried. "Can't you read that notice staring you in the face? It is the likes of you as keeps the likes of us out of many a dacent place !"

In the other House, from the members of the Government downwards, most of the leading and lesser lights have some little mannerism all their own. Mr. Chamberlain is an absolutely unique personality. He is a product of this smart age, but he is also quite original. His eyeglass, his orchid, his frock coat and fancy waistcoat, have all become so identified with his personality, that it is impossible for the public mind to imagine him apart from any of these appurtenances. He is very faithful to the frock coat; the only concession that he will make in summer is to vary its color from black to grey.

On arriving at the House Mr. Chamberlais always does the same 'bing.
He will take from the table the orders for the day, glance at them, and then throw them down with an air of impatience. His next action is to adjust his eyeglass, thrust his legs straight out, and gaze round the House. He is not a quick speaker, neither does he make use of much gesture. All his speeches are neatly written out, and are carefully pre-pared, and many of them are first committed to memory. When he is most calm, he is most dangerous.

As his intensity of feeling grows, he becomes paler and paler, his parchment-like skin being sometimes almost ghastly in its pallor. Mr. Chamberlain has an overwhelming confidence in himself and his own powers, though not up to the esti-mate of a little girl in a Sunday school at Birmingham, who, when asked by her teacher. "Who made all this wonderful world, the sky, the trees, the flowers?" replied, "Please, Miss, Mr. Chamberlain."

CAUGHT BY PIG-TAIL

Millidgeville, Ga., May 29.-Mr. Wu Ting Fang, who delivered an address here yesterday, visited the State insane Asylum this afternoon, when an inmate suddenly became seized with a mania and caught the Minister by the queue, which was hanging down his back. It was jerked and pulled with force, causing excruciating agony. The Minister struggled wildly and, when he was free from the crazy man's grasp, he fled from the building and got into his carriage and de-manded that he be driven back to the city at once. He was overtaken by his friends and his nerves were quiet-

OUEEN WILHELMINA

London, May 29.—In spite of the sincere joy over the recovery of Queen Wilhelmina, says the Brussels correspondent of the Times, there is no spontaneous movement in Holland for a day of national rejoicing. The correspondent says the reason for this given by a Hollander is char-acteristic of the Dutch people and their loyalty. The Hollander said:— "The feeling prevailed from the first that the Queen would recover. It seemed to us that Providence would not so far forsake us as to take away our young sovereign, the heart of our country."

LAURIER BANQUET

Montreal, May 28.-The Patrie's Paris correspondent says that arrangements are now being made to tender a grand banquet to Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the proaching visit to France, M. Fabre the Canadian Commissioner; and M. Siegfried the former French Minisister of Commerce, are the active organizers of the banquet ,and a numerb of the leading French ministers have accepted invitations to attend.

NEW ZEALANDPREMIER

London, May 29.—Premier Seddon, of New Zealand, says the Cape Town correspondent of the Times, strikes the people of Cape Colony forcibly on account of his complete difference from the Cape type of public man. Because of the absence of democracy, as generally understood, as well is the existence of two races and other complications, Cape men are always reserved and cautious in their utterances. Mr. Seddon is a startling contrast to them.

BASEBALL. Wallaceburg Herald-Record.

It had been arranged to have four teams contest for the money, but Oil Springs failed to show up, leaving Chatham, Walpole Island and Wallaceburg to battle for supremacy. The Indians drew the bye, and at 11 a.m., Chatham and Wallaceburg lined up for the first game. Throughout the full nine innings a good, clean sample of baseball was put on, marred but by few errors, and enlivened by many brilliant plays.

Cook and Wright, battery for the locals, proved to be as good as ever the initial bag and played his position as but few could play it. Bowers at third, Appleford at short, and Bourassa at second gathered in all that came their way, while the support of the out-fueld, Elliott, Boulton and ————, was good.
