The Deutschland.

The little episode of the Deutschland, elevated by the German and the American press, which dearly loves a sensation, into quite a fine dramatic performance, threatens to degenerate, after all, into a very good farce. Undoubtedly it was a great feat for a submarine three hundred and fifty feet long (sic) to come safely across the turbulent Atlantic in the incredibly short time of sixteen days, even though it ran less than one hundred miles under water; and Germany is hardly to be blamed for going wild over it. The fact that several British submarines, very much smaller, did the same thing a year ago is not considered relevant. Allowing the magnitude of the journey out, the world will attach more importance to the question of the journey back again. The good ship does not seem to be in a great hurry to undertake it. A week ago she was at all appearances ready to sail, with a nice little cargo of nickel and rubber compactly stowed away. To-day we learn that she has had her wireless apparatus sealed as a penalty for outlawing her welcome, the official duration of which is two weeks.

The newspapers will, of course, be much exercised as to the cause of the delay. It is not impossible that it is remotely connected with the presence of British cruisers off Cape Henry. That they will be kept apprised of her movements and departure is likely enough. The comparative shallowness of the channel from the Chesapeake to the sea, which at its deepest point is only sixty feet, precludes the possibility of her leaving in daylight and makes even a night departure fraught with some danger. It is probable, however, that it is less the cruisers themselves than the country, since they are known to make use of that Captain Koenig fears. The idea of a huge steel net or series of nets just outside the territorial waters is not extravagant; it has been adopted many times with success in the English Channel and the North Sea. Moreover, so nearly perfect are the means at the disposal of the British navy for tracking submarines, that once the Deutschland is sighted her chances of escape will be very slim. She may be able to remain submerged for four days, as her captain claims, but she cannot travel under water for anything like that length of time; she will be compelled to rise to the surface until her storage batteries are recharged.

There is another possible explanation of the Deutschland's immobility. It is known that the Bremer is expected shortly on this side, to duplicate the Deutschland's triumph. Can it be that she is already overdue? It will be deplorable if any accident has overtaken her and robbed American reporters of columns of good copy. But it will not bring peace of mind to the Deutschland's crew. They have completed the first, and easier, part of these undertakings, and with great glory. If the rest is not accomplished, or at least attempted, it will be

Discuss Unto Me.

"Graham Wallas, in his 'Great Society,' wrote few more interesting sentences than that in which he remarked the paucity of genuine discussion around him, the lack of skill in meeting each other's minds which is always contracted un- favorably with action, is discussion rare. The only way we can justify our substitution of talking for acting is to talk badly. And we like to talk badly. To put into talk the deliberate effort which action demands would seem an insufferable pedantry. Talk is one of the few unspecialised talents still left in a mechanical world.

Deplorable Tragedy.

This designation of the Irish deadlock by the English press is hardly an exaggeration. One of those situations has arisen for which it seems impossible to affix the blame or to find a remedy; yet a remedy must be found. The Prime Minister's words hint at nothing less than a general election. This is the last remedy anyone would wish, and it would certainly in the end prove no remedy at all.

The news of the crisis is almost as startling as it is puzzling. A very short time back the public was congratulating itself that the theory question was settled for a time at least. The press re-echoed with praises of the five generally accredited with the greatest share in the performance—Lloyd George, Redmond, Carson, Devlin and Craig. It is strange that an arrangement receiving the approval of all of these recognized spokesmen of all sides of opinion should prove unacceptable. The Prime Minister, and the House of Commons generally, seem to lay the blame for the present impasse at Redmond's door. Asquith declares he is ready to ask the country if the Government's proposals are not fair and just. What proposals? All that we have heard is that the Cabinet, after long discussion, were unable to come to an agreement; it is certain at least that they have no Bill to bring forward. Undoubtedly the Nationalists are taking an uncompromising attitude, but it is not at all clear what their demands are to which the other side cannot accede. It is a great pity that the spirit of concession cannot be as fully manifested as in the earlier stages, considering the times and the temporary nature which any settlement would have. It will be a deplorable tragedy indeed if at the very moment when Britain is exerting her utmost efforts in the war, already promising glorious success, she is torn by domestic strife and an ignominious political debacle. From such a catastrophe it will not be any statesman but the good sense of the nation which will save it.

A British Hero.

Private George Wilson is one of those creatures who seem to have stepped straight from the age of stone into this age of magazine rifles, machine howitzers, to find that the human qualities of courage have not changed very much after all.

In a wood near Veronil there was posted a German machine gun, and because it was so well screened the machine gun was a menace and a nuisance. The Highland Light Infantry, moving forward in the attack of the 5th Brigade, found it more than a menace and a nuisance. They were losing a number of good men because of it, and they felt that it should be silenced. Private Wilson, not a man strikingly heroic to the eye, felt this concrete fact even more than his comrades. Not only did he think the mitrailleuse should be put out of action, he thought he should be the man to effect this ideal. He mentioned the fact to his officer.

The officer said "No" with a certain amount of promptness, and the machine gun continued its steady industry of slaughtering Highland Infantrymen. It also continued to annoy Private Wilson until, at last, his emotion reached that point when it overruled the axioms of discipline, and he determined in spite of his officers to go out and silence the tormenter.

He went out. Another man jumped forward with him, a man of the Middlesex Regiment, and in the face of a tremendous fusillade the two charged the gun. They rushed forward for many yards, though every yard should have meant death. The Germans loosed excitedly at them to pull them up, but for moments they were untouched. Then, suddenly, the throng of bullets caught the Middlesex man, and down in a heap he went.

Private Wilson, however, did not go down. He survived amazingly in the face of the frantic firing. The luck of heroes was with him and he was not touched. Bullets spat and hised all about him but he went running on. The Germans, unable to touch him with their rifles, swung the machine gun on him. They intended to blow him out of existence with the spouting jet of its many bullets.

Private Wilson was too sharp for them. As a gunner jumped to the firing levers of the maxim, the Britisher's rifle went up and jumped off, and the gunner collapsed against the tripod of the gun. Another man sprang to the firing seat, kicking aside his comrade; he died before he could sit down. There was another man in his place immediately—an other man dead immediately. In this mad and magnificent charge Wilson could do no wrong. Every time a man leapt to the gun the infantryman's rifle spoke, and that man died. Wilson in this breathless moment shot the entire crew of six.

He rushed in to capture the gun, and as he did so the German officer who commanded the detachment came to his feet. Wilson had wounded him already, but not enough to make him helpless. The German rose pluckily, and his revolver jerked off in his hand at once. It was Wilson's day of days, however, for the revolver missed, and Wilson finished his man with the bayonet.

With this act he had accomplished his end; the quick-firer was silenced. That, however, was not quite enough for the Light Infantryman. The gun was still unsafe and he saw no reason why it should not be used. There was a mass of Germans not a hundred yards away, and the Britisher determined they should have a sample of their own gun's fire. They did. Working calmly at the firing levers, in a penumbra of shrapnel bursts, Private George Wilson sent 750 rounds of ammunition into the Teutonic mass, and the mass broken. They went down right and left as the bullets bit into them, and when they had had enough they fled.

When all this was done, Wilson picked up the quick-firer and carried it back as a peace-offering to the officer who had forbidden him to capture it. He then fainted, but not for long.—W. D. Newton in "The Undying Story."

CONFIDENT OF VICTORY

LONDON, T

Naval expenditure, added to the fact that it had reached high water mark in the exclusive of munitions, in last October. From January to June, the Government had expended less than in November. The Premier, continued the Premier, would be higher than that of the war. It was expected, apart from change in policy, that the Premier would be maintained for the future. Munition expenditure increased steadily and continued to May; in that month and June and July it was fairly constant. Under all heads expenditure might be expected to expand more. Daily average loans mentioned had dropped from 1,000 in the first period to £1,000 in the second period, but there was a slight increase. The Premier, were very high, because in the first period was one item of 12 million pounds attributable in reality to the period. Allowing for that, the expenditure under this head increased. The figure for the period was told by the fact that the Government had advanced £1,000 to Australia to enable the Commonwealth to finance the wheat contracted for by the Government. After a speech by Premier Asquith for not the war situation, Lloyd George, Secretary for War, replied, "It would be premature to say anything about the middle of the battle. The facts are good, the War Office said; our generals are more confident with the proud record of the British infantry in the Crimea and Napoleon's army never have been greater. One thrills with pride in the fact that one belongs to the British. They are pressing back a man who devoted his best years to the study of the war for years, confident that victory is
