

CHAPTER XXIX
JIM HAS PARTNER DANGER AND EXCITING ADVENTURES.

"Cherokee" said the chief, pointing to himself and his companions. "Oh, son of Cherokee, are you?" exclaimed Jim, changing his expression of contempt to one of unbounded admiration. "Delighted to make your acquaintance, Messrs. Cherokee—you're gentlemen, you are, quite tip-top, a mile at least above them low wretches of Chickasaws. I'm an Englishman—they call me Jim Potts."

"Shimpo," repeated the chief, with a pleasant nod all round. "Oh, well, Shimpo, if you like it better, anything to oblige—at least in present circumstances," he added under his breath.

"Paleface?" said the chief, inquiringly. "Well, yes, my face should be pale, but it isn't, all along of them vile Chickasaws, who smeared it with red juice, which I hope won't be long of washing off. I give you my word of honor, my face was of the real pale sort the day before yesterday."

"Paleface" repeated the chief, in the same inquiring tone, for he failed to catch the import of Jim's elaborate explanation. "Yes, paleface," answered Jim, more laconically; "most decidedly paleface."

Whereupon the chief ran towards him in the most friendly manner, took his face between his hands, and rubbed his nose against the sides of his own. The same salutation had to be gone through by all the rest in turn, much to Jim's inconvenience and disgust, for each new rubbing left an additional quantity of rancid oil on his nasal organ, which was anything but pleasant to the olfactory nerve. But the demonstration was too much in the way of friendship for any objection to be made, or expressed, and Jim had therefore to grin and bear it, and he stood the ordeal with wonderful success—taking the first opportunity, however, to remove from his nose the accumulated grease, by the odours of which he would otherwise have soon been upset.

The next act of the Cherokee was to bring him a plentiful supply of the bread they had been cooking, and as the latter was ravenously hungry, it proved highly acceptable, even in the half-raw state in which it was presented. Jim would of course much rather have had a feed of England's royal fare—roast beef and plum pudding; but as this was at present clearly unobtainable, he filled his hungry stomach with what was to be had, and washed it down with a copious draught from the river in which he had been so nearly drowned.

Breakfast being over, and friendly relations being thus satisfactorily established, Jim was naturally anxious to know what the next proceedings were to be. He made inquiry as best he could by signs, and in reply he was given to understand that they were about to depart from that spot to join a large party of their tribe, which was marching through the forest at no great distance to attack a party of Chickasaws who were out in the war path.

Jim expressed himself ready to accompany them, as indeed it was the best thing he could do. Before they set out, however, it was necessary to him that he would be highly agreeable to his new friends if he would cast aside the Chickasaw dress and don the Cherokee garb.

"With all the pleasure in life," said Jim, as with alacrity he denuded himself of the scanty covering which was around him, and to show how cordially he hated the Chickasaws, he threw the rags under his feet, stamped upon them ignominiously, then kicked them into the fire, which soon burned them into ashes—a course of proceeding which elicited many grateful grunts of satisfaction from the delighted Cherokee.

Arrayed in the more royal dress which the chief presented to him, Jim and his new companions departed from the side of the river and struck into the forest, where, after several hours' travelling they reached a glade where the main body was encamped.

Little did Jim anticipate the joyous surprise which here awaited him. Dundas has some enterprising Town Councillors. The Banner says:—We understand that on Tuesday last a foot race was arranged between one of our Town Councillors and one of the "great unwashed" for a purse of $10—each party staking $5 in the belief that he would prove himself to be the fleetest of foot. The distance to be run is fixed at 100 yards, and both men are in training for the event.

Few people unacquainted with physiological chemistry are aware of the quantity of iron in the blood, but all should know the importance of keeping up the supply, for debility, disease and death are sure to follow when the quantity becomes too much reduced. The Peruvian Syrup (a protoxide of Iron) supplies this vital element, and has cured many chronic diseases.

DE WHEELER'S COMPOUND ELIXIR OF PHOSPHATES AND CALIFORNIA. Sandy Creek, Aug. 31st, 1872. The Compound Elixir of Phosphates and California prepared by you I have been for two years using liberally in my practice, and I assure you that in my judgment there is no preparation of its kind that can compare with it where it is applicable. With feeble, anemic women, of whom we have so many, and in cases convalescing from prostrating diseases I should hardly know how to get along without it. In Dyspepsia it acts like a charm—in fact in any of the long list of exhaustive diseases it is the REMEDY.

I am, yours truly,
