court fines and the payment to county constables, Mr. Woodcock said: "Every magistrate has to certify to the accounts of constables. Whether they are right or not we cannot always tell." If there was an excess the matter ought to have been referred to him personally and not made public by the auditors. "And I want to say gentlemen," continued the magistrate, "that if I am not disgraced by the government, the county judge will not have the opportunity to audit my accounts in the future. I will take them to the county council, where they belong."
