KEEP OUT OF THE PAST.

Whatever you do in this wonderful world,
In business, in church or at play,
Whatever of gain or loss you have met
With the others who go away,
Keep out of the past
From the first to the last,
And away from its worries stay;
The present has wealth you would never suspect,
If prudent you are and wisely elect
To live in the light of to-day.

The things that are past did very well once,
To-day they are dusty and stale.
That trouble you had with your fellowman—
Did you struggle in vain or fail?
What of it indeed!
There is all the more need
That you start on a different trail.
Don't take to the woods, whatever you do,
Just look right ahead, there's a fortune for you
In keeping a well-trimmed sail.

So cramped can we be in our mental states,
So burdened with our might-have-beens,
That life will become a woeful waste
For its many outs-and ins.
But stop and reflect;
You will never be wrecked
By your own or another's sins,
If the past you will keep in its proper place
And meet what is yours with a candid face—
'Tis the man of to-day who wins.

Defeated by Dr. Hamilton.

In no way is health so menaced as by constipation. It leads to indigestion, insomnia, anaemia and a hundred ills. Ordinary remedies fail—they relieve—don't cure. The worst case is defeated and cured quickly by Dr. Hamilton's Pills, which cleanse the entire intestinal tract, stimulate kidneys and liver, keeps the pores of the skin open. You'll never have stomach trouble, yellow complexion or headaches if you use Dr. Hamilton's Pills. They are a perfect system tonic. 25c. at all dealers.

The Heart's Highway.

BY MARY E. WILKINS.

CHAPTER I.

IN 1682, when I was thirty years of age and Mistress Mary Cavendish just turned of eighteen, she and I together one Sabbath morning in the month of April were riding to meeting in Jamestown. We were all alone except for the troop of black slaves straggling in the rear, blurring the road curiously with their black faces. It seldom happened that we rode in such wise, for Mistress Catherine Cavendish, the elder sister of Mistress Mary, and Madam Cavendish, her grandmother, usually rode with us—Madam Judith Cavendish, though more than seventy, sitting a horse as well as her granddaughters and looking, when viewed from the back, as young as they and being in that respect as well as others a wonder to the countryside.

But it happened today that Madam Cavendish had a touch of the rheumatics, that being an ailment to which the swampy estate of the country rendered those of advanced years somewhat liable, and had remained at home on her plantation of Drake Hill. Catherine, who was a most devoted granddaughter, had remained with her, although I suspected with some hesitation at allowing her young sister to go alone, except for me, the slaves being accounted no more company than our shadows.

Mistress Catherine Cavendish had looked at me after a fashion which I was at no loss to understand when I had stood aside to allow Mistress Mary to precede me in passing the door, but she had no cause for the look nor for the apprehension which gave rise to it. By reason of bearing always my burden upon my own back I was even more mindful of it than others were who had only the sight of it, whereas I had the sore weight and the evil aspect in my inmost soul. But it was to be borne easily enough by virtue of that natural resolution of a man which can make but a featherweight of the sorest ills if it be but put in the balance against them. I was tutor to Mistress Mary Cavendish, and I had sailed from England to Virginia under circumstances of disgrace—being, indeed, a convict.

I knew exceedingly well what was my befitting deportment when I set out that Sabbath morning with Mistress Mary Cavendish, and not only upon that Sabbath morning, but at all other times. Still I can well understand that my appearance may have belied me, since when I looked in a glass I would often wonder at the sight of my own face, which seemed younger than my years and was strangely free from any recording lines of experiences which might have been esteemed bitter by any one who had not the pride of bearing them.

When my black eyes, which had a bold daring in them, looked forth at me from the glass and my lips smiled with a gay confidence at me, I could not but surmise that my whole face was as a mask worn unwittingly over a grave spirit.

I rode a pace behind Mary Cavendish and never glanced her way, not needing to do so in order to see her, for I seemed to see her with a superior sort of vision, compounded partly of memory and partly of imagination. Of the latter I had, not to boast, though it may perchance be naught to boast of, being simply a kind of higher folly, a somewhat large allowance from my childhood. But that was not to be wondered at, whether it were to my credit or otherwise, since it was inherited from ancestors of much nobler fame and worthier parts than I, one of whom, though not in the direct line, the great Edward Maria Wingfield, the president of the first council of the Dominion of Virginia having written a book which was held to be notable.

This imagination for the setting forth and adorning of all common things and happenings and my woman's name of Maria, my whole name being Harry Maria Wingfield, through my ancestor having been a favorite of a great queen and so called for her honor, were all my inheritance at that date, all the estates belonging to the family having become the property of my younger brother John.

But when I speak of my possessing an imagination which could gild all the common things of life I meant not to include Mistress Mary Cavendish therein, for she needed not such gilding, being one of the most uncommon things in the earth, as uncommon as a great diamond which is rumored to have been seen by travelers in far India. My imagination when directed toward her was exercised only with the comparing and combining of various and especial beauties of different times and circumstances, when she was attired this way or that way, or was grave or gay, or sweetly helpless and clinging or full of daring. When, riding near her, I did not look at her, she seemed all of these in one, and I was conscious of such a great dazzle forcing my averted eyes that I seemed to be riding behind a star.

That morning Mistress Mary glowed and glittered and flamed in gorgeous apparel until she seemed to fairly overreach all the innocent young flowery beauties of the spring with one rich trill of color, like a high note of a bird above a wide chorus of others. Mistress Mary that morning wore a tabby petticoat of a crimson color, and a crimson satin bodice shining over her arms and shoulders like the plumage of a bird, and down her back streamed her curls, shining like gold under her gauze love hood.

Mistress Mary wore a mask of black velvet to screen her face from the sun, and only her sweet forehead and her great blue eyes and the rose leaf tip of her chin showed.

The road was miry in places, and then I would fall behind her farther still that the water and red mud splashing from beneath my horse's hoofs might not reach her. Then, finally, after I had done thus some few times, she reined in her Merry Roger and looked over her shoulder with a flash of her blue eyes which compelled mine.

"Why do you ride so far away, Master Wingfield?" said she.

I lifted my hat and bent so low in my saddle that the feather on it grazed the red mud.

"Because I fear to splash your fine tabby petticoat, madam," I answered.

"I care not for my fine petticoat," said she in a petulant way, like that of a spoiled child who is forbidden sweets and the moon and questions love in consequence, yet still there was some little fear and hesitation in her tone. Mistress Mary was a most docile pupil, seeming to have great respect for my years and my learning, and was as gentle under my hand as was her Merry Roger under hers, and yet with the same sort of gentleness, which is as the pupil and not as the master decides and lets the pull of the other will be felt.

I answered not, yet kept at my distance, but at the next miry place she held in Merry Roger until I was forced to come up, and then she spoke again, and as she spoke a mockbird was singing somewhere over on the bank of the river.

"Did you ever hear a sweeter bird's song than that, Master Wingfield?" said she, and I answered that it was very sweet, as indeed it was.

"What do you think the bird is mocking, Master Wingfield?" she said, and then I answered like a fool, for the man who meets sweetness with his own bitterness and keeps it not locked in his own soul is a fool.

"I hope not," said I, "but he may be mocking the hope of the spring and he may be mocking the hope in the heart of man. The song seems too sweet for a mock of any bird which has no thought beyond this year's nest."

Mistress Mary's blue eyes, as helpless of comprehension as a flower, looked in mine.

"But there will be another spring, Master Wingfield," she said somewhat timidly, and then she added, and I knew that she was blushing under her mask at her own tenderness, "and sometimes the hopes of the heart come true."

She rode on with her head bent as one who considers deeply, but I, knowing her well, knew that the mood would soon pass, as it did. Suddenly she tossed her head and flung out her curls to the breeze and swung Merry Roger's bridle rein and was away at a gallop, and I after her, measuring the ground with wide paces on my tall thoroughbred. In this fashion we soon left the plodding blacks so far behind that they became a part of the distance shadows.

Then all at once Mistress Mary swerved off from the main road and was riding down the track leading to the plantation wharf, whence all the tobacco was shipped for England and all the merchandise imported for household use unladen. There the way was very wet, and the mire was splashed high up on Mistress Mary's fine tabby skirt, but she rode on at a reckless pace, and I also, much at a loss to know what had come to her, yet not venturing, or rather, perhaps, deigning, to inquire. And then I saw what she had doubtless seen before, the mast of a ship rising straightly among the trees.

When I saw the mast I knew that the ship belonging to Madam Cavendish, which was called the Golden Horn and had upon the bow the likeness of a gilt horn, running over with fruit and flowers, had arrived. It was by this ship that Madam Cavendish sent the tobacco raised upon the plantation of Drake Hill to England.

But even then I knew not what had so stirred Mistress Mary that she had left her sober churchward road upon the Sabbath day, and judged that it must be the desire to see the Golden Horn, fresh from her voyage; nor did I dream what she proposed doing.

As we came up to the ship lying in her dock we saw sailors on deck grouped around a cask of that same wine which they had taken the freedom to broach in order to celebrate their safe arrival in port, though it was none of theirs. The sight aroused my anger, but Mary Cavendish did not seem to see any occasion for wrath. She sat her prancing horse, her head up and her curls streaming like a flag of gold, and there was a blue flash in her eyes of which I knew the meaning. The blood of her great ancestor, the sea king, Thomas Cavendish, who was second only to Sir Francis Drake, was astir within her.

She sat there with the salt sea wind in her nostrils and her hair flung upon it like a pennant of victory and looked at the ship wet with the ocean surges, the sails stiff with the rime of salt and the group of English sailors on the deck, and those old ancestral instincts which constitute the memory of the blood awoke.

Then as suddenly that mood left her as she sat there, the sailors having risen and standing staring with shamefaced respect and covertly wiping, with the hairy backs of hands, their mouths red with wine. But the captain, one Calvin Tabor, stood before them with more assurance, as if he had some warrant for allowing such license among his men. He himself seemed not to have been drinking. Mistress Mary regarded them, holding in Merry Roger with her firm little hand, with the calm grace of a queen, although she was so young, and all the wild fire was gone from her blue eyes.
