A boy, large for his gg, an about twelve, with very bold, fearless, courage twelve, with very bold, fearless, courage markable eyest) head well shaped aid well shaped aid well stands one in the barbers dress, two garments only, a ragged shirt with no buttons, and an old pair of footmant hereches with his left hand on his left him. We have seen that together by a clutch with his left hand on his left him. We have seen him before. On the tramp? No; his well-shaped feet show no signs of it. A thier? No; he would be better dressed. Tried with a hymn book upside down, he knows no difference, but says that he came there to see if the gentlement would teach him something to get this living by. This demand for technical education being pretermitted until the proper time, the boy is asked if he knows any thing; he replies that he learned some of the Catechism once. Here is an opening.

"What is your name?"

"Meerschanma"?

There he stands at the end of the bench just come in, holding hill bracches, and shirt together by a clutch with his left hand on his left him. Meerschaum was proceeding into theological reasonings far beyond the farthest flight of his questioners; when the Evening Hymn was started, previous to the closing prayer, which was fortunate for one of the two parties in conversation, at all events. Before the boys were sent to bed the original interrogator of Meerschaum and the mannger had an interview with the boyl 1111.

Father had been a sailor, drowned.
Mother had been a very kind to him, until the judge gave her six years about a bad half crown; they were always giving his mother bad money. Any relations? An aunt, married at Gravesend, but no good, at least not to him. He wanted to learn a trade. Would he be good? If he hadn't was t d to be good, he would not have come here; if he wanted to be bad, he might have gone to heaps of places.
Wanted to be like his father; wanted to be like the good gentleman that old Judas told him about Jesus Christ. What did he know about Him? Nothing, except that he was a good gentleman without any money; thought he would have help ed him to learn a trade if he had been alive, but he was dead now, though Judas said that he was coming alive again.
Wished he would come soon; thought he was very much wanted. Asked as to the character whom he had so often mentioned as Judas, he r. place that he was a general cove who lived in Gravel Lane with a young girl the same age as he, Meer schaum, was. The boy was dismissed to hold.

HARRISON, deels A ND we are prepared to supply our frie and the public with the Freshest Goods DEPOSITED AT OTTAWA...... After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes the French Protestants fled away, like storm-birds in a gale of wind in spring time, to find the nearest place in which they could make their nests. The nearest place for many of them was the East of London and in Spitalifickis, where we may find them still, or, to be more correct, their descendants.

The Confers came there at the Revocation; they were Dieppe people, and worked at ivory. Long after the revocation of the Edict, even after the Great Revolution itself had been torgotten, the name Coulier stood over the shop in the cast, and in a part which was then a suburb. It was never known, and will never be known, exactly what money they made, but at the end of the first half of this century their business had utterly declined. There was a little dusty ivory-work still in the window, but no que went in to buy it, and if any one had, old Jerome Coulier would have asked him six times its price, and then have made faces at him; Jerome Coulier was supposed to be the last of the whole family.
