audience with which I am not acquainted. I like to see some other victim first on the altar and to watch his distress as the curtain raising approaches and to see how the audience appreciates what he says. I get in this way an idea of the audience and what it wants and I can accommodate myself to its mood, set my bark on the current and then it goes almost of itself.

However, the Chairman has helped me out somewhat and I have this consciousness that wherein I lack in my unvarnished speech, which will be made up of catches here and there, the gentlemen who come after me are stalwarts everyone and where I fail to fill in they will do it most admirably I have no doubt. So you are in for a fairly good time this evening.
