WHEN BESSIE MOVED. J.

By MARIE WAIT.

Copyright, 1907, by Marie Watt.

Bessie sat with her face against the pane of the south window. Ever since the gathering dusk of the winter afternoon had settled down she had watch ed the road for signs of the team. Two of the loads had come and gone. The last should have started only an hour or so after the others, yet it was nearly 9 o'clock and the familiar form had not put in appearance.

Then a knock at the door startled her, and she cowered into the darkness, hoping that the intruder, whoever it might be, would become tired and go away. Instead, the knocking continued, and presently there was a gust of cold air as the door was thrown open. It could not be the folks. They were coming from the south. It must be a tramp.

The furniture was still piled in the center of the room, and there was no hiding place save the great cupboard that had been Grandma Bailey's, Softly she stole across the room, but was just concealing herself when a man entered carrying a lantern.

Tremblingly she obeyed his command to come out and stood facing him. There was nothing very terrible about his appearance. He was muffled up to his eyes in coats and scarf, but the eyes were frank and kindly, and there was a twinkle suggestive of fun. "Give an account of yourself," he demanded. "Trying to steal the house?"

"We are moving in," she cried indignantly. "I came on with the first load, and mother and father were to be here with the last, They have not arrived yet. I don't know what can be keep them. I am Bessle Lyford," she added as an afterthought. "And I'm Joel Ware," he introduced.

"I just got back from town and saw the lights. I did not know that the new owners were moving in and came over to see if tramps were in the house "I have been here since 11," she said.

"We are moving over from Groton. I was to show the men where to put the things. The last load went-oh, years ago! "And you've been sitting here since

"And you've been sitting here since then watching for your folks," he said, looking at the chair by the window. "Had your supper?"

"I had a cold lunch," she said Indifferently. "The the last load." "The kitchen things are on

"I'll bring something over," he declared. "I haven't had my supper yet." He slipped out, and Bessie sank into the chair by the window to resume her watch. After awhile he returned, and she went out into the dining room, where he was straightening out the chairs. The steam of the hot coffee filled the room with its delicious odor, and for the first time she realized that she was hungry.

"I brought mine, too," he explained.

"It'll save time." He drew up a chair, and presently she found herself chatting as she sip ped the coffee and munched the bis cuit. Joel, she found, kept bachelor hall in the little farmhouse across the way. In the summer he had several hands helping him, but in the winter he lived by himself and was glad enough to have neighbors again.

She almost forgot her troubles until the tray was depleted and Joel rose. "I'll take these things over to the house," he said, "and then come back.

You won't be scared, will you?" Bessie shook her head laughingly. There was a certainty of movement about Joel that induced confidence, and as she watched the light go up in his kitchen while he moved about at his the light brought comfort to her. Then the light went out again, and she could see him striding through light snow that had begun to fail. She looked up with a smile as he entered

"I was tempted to run across and help you with the dishwashing," she said. "I never thought or I should have offered to do so before you left." "I guess I can do my own chores," he laughed back. "I was wondering how it would do to hitch up and drive back Groton way. I've got a fresh team, and if you don't mind being alone I can find out what's the matter. alone I can find out what's the matter.

I brought my revolver over so you would feel safer. I don't suppose

"But it's such a long, cold drive," "I guess a little snow won't hurt me or the team much," he laughed. "You'll be worrying till you know what the matter is. I'll bring in some wood for the stoves and then get you'll need it, but it might be a comfort to feel that you had it."

He built up a roaring fire and then turned to Bessie.
"This is a sort of back road," he explained. "The tramps mostly hold to the line of the railroad, so don't unconscious of the speeding hours until she was awakened by a light touch, She sprang to her feet with a cry of alarm, but was reassured by a glimpse of Joel's kindly face.

"I found 'em about seven miles out," he explained. "It seems that the sled tipped over turning out for another team. Your ma broke her leg and they took her into Deane's and set it. The have been so busy with their own trou-bles that they never thought that you might be worrying and did not send though, and your ma said not to worry. She'll be in shape to move in the morning, and they'll bring her on "Poor ma!" Bessie said softly. "But I'm glad to know that it's only that instead-instead of some of the horrible things I was thinking.' "I thought you'd sleep better if you knew just what the matter was," smiled. "Sleep?" she repeated. "I can't sleep tonight. "Yes, you can," he insisted. "I'm going over to put up the team. Then I'll come back and sit here awhile. You get a bed fixed up and I'll warrant you'll sleep." He was a true prophet, for after shehad won from him a half promise that he would not sit up all night she went to her room, and, exhausted by the emotions so foreign to her usual placid life, she dropped asleep.

The soft black of the winter night was turning to the gray of dawn when she roused herself and stared dumbly for a moment at the unfamiliar room recollection returned, and she slipped on a wrapper and crept down-

A light was burning in the sitting room, and Joel sat reading. He sprang up at her approach with a cheery "Good morning."

"I thought you were not going to sit up all night," she reproached. "I thought you might wake up in the night and be scared," he confessed.
"Now I'm going over to make some coffee and bring it over. It won't take

He was out of the room with the same alert step that had marked his carriage the night before. There was no trace of weariness in his stride. though every bone in his body ached. He was soon back with a breakfast, and this time Bessie had the table pr "You'll have your folks here by dinner time," he said as he gathered up the dishes. "I guess this ends our picnic." "I'm sorry," she confessed softly. "You have been very good to me."

"Just neighborly," he said awkwardly. "I was glad to help out, though it's going to seem pretty lonely over at my house now. A woman sitting across the table does give one an appetite." "You should get married," she sug-gested, with a blush.

"I'm going to," was the straightforward answer, "just as soon as it's polite to propose to you—that is, if you'll "I'll say yes now if you ask me," she promised. "I knew that I loved you when I watched you drive down the road last night and felt that you were
