(CHAPTER XXII.)

"Toney, Toney, my dear, I've just come out to see how you are."

Toney's countenance was radiant.

"Oh, Uncle Dove, it does one good to see your face. Don't you frown so much. It's a jolly morning, isn't it? I want to stretch my legs, otherwise I'm first rate. Minnie's no worse. The doctor will come early I know. Now, I'm going to have forty winks. But, Uncle Dove, do just tell me, ain't you just tremendously glad about Crummet? Have you congratulated her properly?"

"Oh, I forgot all about it, Toney. You put it out of my head. Whatever did you go and stuff yourself in here for?"

"Why, it's your cottage, uncle, and you see it's part of my duty. But I'm real jolly. No time-table, you see! You will just say something nice to Crummet, though, and give her my love—on the sly—and tell her to be sure and keep up her spirits. She wants thumping a bit. But her young man is really a saintly sort of missionary. I was glad he had no girl—wife I mean—aren't you, Uncle Dove?"

"Of course, of course. Very suitable, but nothing to live on."

"I say, Uncle Dove, I wish you'd write to General Stone, and tell him from me that I hope the whistle is useful, and tell him what I'm doing, and any little news that comes into your head. He was so kind to me—he really was."

"Ah, so I will. He took a great interest in you, Toney."

"Did he? Is Aunt Dove angry? I really did it all in a minute without thinking. Do tell her. But, you see, she doesn't want me at all, and so she won't worry."

Sir Evas waved a good-bye and retired. He felt very like a thief, but he kept his counsel and delivered none of Toney's messages.

Toney took her forty winks, and did not wake till the doctor came. He found everything had been done for the sick child, and, moreover, done excellently well.

"You are a born nurse, Miss Whitburn."

"No, Pups made me one. We had cases sometimes in our house when the people had no relations handy. He liked to have me better than a trained nurse, he said, because I obeyed, and didn't go by hard and fast rules. But I say, doctor, poor Minnie's worse, isn't she?"

"Yes, she's worse to-day. I expected it. Are you afraid of being left?"

"Afraid, oh, no! I only obey orders, and Pups said a nurse had to obey, that was all."

"You do that thoroughly. I'll come again at mid-day."

Toney had several garden visitors that morning. The first was Lewis Waycott, and when she put out her head, looking a little paler, but smiling as usual, he was reassured.

"Don't you come too near," she called out. "I've got carbolic sheets and all sorts of smelling things, but still—Oh, Mr. Waycott, does your aunt think I'm very stupid?"

"No, of course not."

"Well, I'm glad. I wish you'd go and congratulate Crummet."

"I've done it really and truly, but I'll do it again if you like."

They both laughed.

"I mustn't stay now, but it was kind of you to come," said Toney.

"Oh, no, not at all. Can you hoist up this basket? Aunt Honoria sent it, and I've put in some flowers. I know you like choice flowers."

"Well, now! No one has thought of flowers but you. You are just jolly."

"I'm glad you think so anyhow. Miss Toney, I'm going to have a campaign among my cottages. Do you know that Latham has several times talked to me about sanitary matters, but I left it all to Field. I think I'll see to it myself in future."

"I am glad. Pups said that when he was a boy, landowners were all far too sleepy about such things. If you could see how ill poor Minnie is, you would look after the cottages yourself. Thank you, Good-bye."

"I'll come again if you will let me."

Poor Thomas, frightened now into soberness, also came to enquire about his child. Toney was not able to see him, but Mary carried on the conversation, and Lady Dove's niece silently laughed at some portions of which she overheard.

Another day went by, and yet many others. Lewis Waycott came every day, sometimes twice a day, so did Mr. Hales and Sir Evas; but the latter came without telling Lady Dove, though strangely enough he was always ready and able to deliver a message from her. Miss Crump sent notes by Jim, but she was not allowed to receive any in return. Altogether Toney felt that she was having rather a good time. If only she could have had a good run, but that was impossible. Even sleep was curtailed, as Mary wanted a good deal of rest. One day, however, the doctor was accompanied by an old woman, Minnie's maternal grandmother, who, having heard of the illness, came from a distant village "to give a hand," as she expressed it.

"I am afraid, Miss Whitburn, that the old lady will be of no use as far as nursing goes," said the doctor. "She is as deaf as a post, and she will only give you extra work, but I thought, under the circumstances, it was better to let her come. Minnie is very ill."

"Oh, of course," exclaimed Toney, shaking hands with the old woman, who was deaf and dim-sighted. "I can make signs. We must not shout in the room. She can help to keep up the fire, and perhaps she can watch the pot boil, but I have very little cooking to do, for I get such good things sent to me every day. I'll put a mattress on the floor for myself, and she can have the big bed."

"You'll be uncomfortable, I'm afraid."

Toney only laughed, and Dr. Latham was reassured. Such splendid health as Toney possessed was a daily pleasure for him to behold.

Old Mrs. Greenham, being able to sit by the sick child, gave Toney a little more time to herself, so she employed her leisure by writing to General Stone.

She wanted to be sure he had heard all about Miss Crump's engagement. This was the letter she wrote to him:

"My Dear General Stone,—I am going to send you a letter from an infected place. (Uncle Dove has told you all about I know.) But don't be afraid. Your letter shall have two carbolic baths before you receive it. Dr. Latham and I are fighting infection. It's so delightful to feel I am doing some of Pups' work. My patient is very ill, but we do everything we can to save her. If only it doesn't spread we shall be glad. I'm going to take you at your word. Will you please send me two shillings, and I'll send you a whistle or something else, as soon as it's safe. The old lady who is with me wants some snuff badly, and she hasn't any money, and I haven't any either, as you know. I don't like to ask Uncle Evas, as I don't think he cares to buy odd things. I want to know if you are quite well; I do wish you could come and have a talk under the window. Uncle Dove says I am like Juliet, but my chief Romeo is Jim, Mr. Waycott and Uncle Dove. You know how he likes to make fun. But the greatest piece of news of all is, that Miss Crump is really engaged to be married. Have you found the living? Don't forget it, please. I think the Archbishop gives livings away to good men, and really Mr. Faber is a kind of early Christian. I am sure he would give his clothes away, but, from something Crummet said, I rather fancy that he has only two suits. She writes such funny notes about him. She is head over ears in love. Aunt Dove is very angry and says Miss Crump is not to leave her. Aunt is very much afraid of infection, so I can't write to her and tell her that I mean to succeed Miss Crump. I shall have twenty pounds a year if I give satisfaction. I do want to have a good run again. I should so much like to drive you this afternoon; Bess goes a mile a minute when she's well driven. Uncle Dove comes on the sly. I'm sure, though he doesn't tell me so, and I really believe he invents all Aunt Dove's messages. He is getting quite clever over it. I'm afraid it's wrong, but it's very amusing! I don't tell him I've found him out! Yesterday he said that Aunt Dove hoped I should soon be back again. You know she doesn't like me at all much, so that was a very big white lie. I send messages back to her, but I'm sure he does not give them. He brought me a meringue the other day wrapped up in a letter. He knows I like them, but the cream all squished out at one end in his pocket. He pretended he didn't mind! I hope Aunt Dove won't find it out. I've only one more thing to say. Did you mean to give Jim a sovereign or a shilling? I've got the sovereign and will return it if you meant it for a shilling. He was awfully pleased. I'm keeping it for him, it's wiser. Young men say 'yes' so easily. One must help them to resist the wish to go on a drink! Please answer soon about the snuff."

"I am always."

"Your affectionate TONEY."

"P.S.—I still think you the nicest General I have seen. When Mr. Faber was asking Miss Crump, I had to vault over a gate into a field. They hadn't quite done when I came back. It was very awkward, but they didn't seem to mind. The arm-chair looks beautiful. I hope Aunt Dove will let Crummet take it away with her. How much does it cost to furnish an English house? Our humpy was rigged up for two pounds."

Toney's fingers felt cramped after finishing this letter, but she stretched her arms and legs by making the beds and then cooking some dampers till the doctor came.
