The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

"I desire to serve your lordship," was the humble rejoinder; "for to your powerful aid I am indebted for the title I bear and the lands I own."
"Speak then," (Gloomily.)
"I came hither with that intent, and would have told you my thought, but that your lordship made me believe that you looked with favourable eyes upon the passion your sister bears this Master Elliot."
"Death," cried Angus, starting furiously, "by what word or look could I give you to think that I would stand by and see my sister won by a nameless hind?"
"I see that I have been mistaken, and that your lordship has failed to note what every hearing of the castle makes his common gossip."
"By every saint in heaven, if this be as you say, the loon shall pay dearly for daring to lift his eyes to a daughter of Douglas. Go on, man, let me know all and speedily."
"I fear that he has not only dared to lift his eyes, but has spoken and been heard with favour."
"Presumptuous cur!"
Angus paced the chamber with rapid strides, his countenance black with rage.
"It was but now," Barra continued in a subdued voice like the low hissing of a serpent, "that Master Ogilvie, of the Guard acquainted me that, by request of Mistress Douglas, Captain Lindsay, with six gentlemen, started yesterday for Etrick Forest to protect her ladyship's favoured one from some anticipated peril. Do but note her face when Elliot is near as I have done, and you will be blind indeed if you fail to find the proof of this—she loves him."
"Something I have noticed that this son farms," muttered the earl between his clenched teeth.
He continued for some minutes to pace the floor as if trying to bring his passion under control. Barra hurriedly from beneath his heavy brows watched him the while.
At length he halted in front of Barra and looked him fixedly in the face.
"I know you bear this youth no good will, Barra."
"Me, my lord?"
"Tush, man, do not affect to deny it. For some reason shown only to yourself, you bear him a grudge, and have twice before set me against him. This time I would discredit you, but that my own suspicions tally with your assertions."
"I am sure of that. I have no object in calumniating the young man, but that my interest in my lordship."
"But, I will put your assertions and your fidelity to the proof. If the first be true, this hind shall be degraded and turned hence like a stray cur after a whipping. Then your fidelity must devise means to put him for ever beyond the power of communicating with Mistress Douglas."
Barra bowed low.
"I accept the trust, and if I might suggest—"
"Well go on."
"If I might suggest the means, I think Mistress Douglas might readily be cured of any silly regard she may entertain for the youth."
"She shall forget him at my bidding—if she ever thought of him otherwise than as a useful vassal."
Barra shrugged his shoulders and looked doubtful.
"Women are so weak yet so strong, or obstinate you may call it, in these matters," he said deprecatingly, "that an attempt to force her ladyship's will may act as the wind upon a spark of fire on a heath—it may blow out the spark, but the chances are that it will fan it into a blaze that will consume all it meets."
"You have a scheme to propose?"
"I have. If it might please you, there is a simple but effective way to cure her of her folly—entirely supposing that she has been guilty of it," he added hastily.
"Name the remedy and you shall have thanks for your beneficent."
"Let her see her lordship and dishonour-ed. That will prove a heavy cross, for trust me women when they love, and ere the wed, make idols of their lovers; you have but to present the idol in a mean light and—pshaw!—away goes passion with the false trappings that gave it rest."
"That may serve."
"It that be not enough then send her ladyship for a little while to the priory of St. Margaret, where in solitude she will rightly speedily come to a sense of her own want-warmness and folly."
"It shall be as you say; and on the instant I will about the work. Await me here."
