"Do not talk so. Your mother's heart will gladden to see you, and your father is ever ready to forgive you. "Let me right the wrongs I have done before I ask for forgiveness."

Henry Kyle unsaddled his horse and led him down where the grass was green and long and staked him. Then he came back and sat talking with Kushat till near midnight. "I will do it, Kushat. But, mind you, I am not worthy of your devotion. I am bad, thoroughly bad."

"Another could not say that to me. I know not whether you be good or bad, as the white men use these words—I only know that I love you."

"Then you remain with me," said Henry, taking her little red hands and raising them as if he were going to raising them as if he were going to raising them as if he were going to kiss them. But he did not do so. "It will make me stronger to know that I am not wholly worthless and degraded. Your love will keep alive my self-respect. But even here I see my own selfishness. Come, Kushat, bring your horse here."

Kushat flew off, silent as a shadow, and came back in a few minutes mounted on a spirited, graceful animal. Henry Kyle saddled his horse, and with the Indian girl by his side rode out of the silent valley.
