Beautiful Furniture

For the Home.

It is not too early in the season to commence planning for the re-furnishing of the home for the spring. Most everyone does some fitting up—adding here and there some new piece of furniture—perhaps furnishing the drawing-room, the dining-room or the bedroom new throughout.

Just a word to say that readers of the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL will find on the two large floors given over wholly to furniture a very beautiful assortment of furniture suited for any room.

—Finer and different goods to what you find anywhere else, and price more reasonable than you would have expected. Mail order enquiries have the most careful attention.

suing section on the brow of the hill. This time the black figures were swallowed up among the trees on the ridge directly overhanging Price and the deaf man. Smith dropped the butt of his gun to the ground with an oath and came back on his toes, listening to the voices up above him and to the trampling in the timber. When he heard the gun trails fall on the hollow ground with a rattling of chains, followed by the scrambling of teams and the bumping of wheels over obstacles, he squatted down in his tracks without speaking, and the deaf man, observing his action, lay down by his side, keeping a hold on the bridle reins.

The lid of a limber chest creaked and fell with a bang. Somebody in authority swore frightfully. The twigs cracked under running feet, and the rammer heads beat on the shells like striking blows with a wooden mallet in a barrel.

One gunner cried, "Ready—fire!" There was a rushing overhead like the passing of a giant rocket, but this was nothing to the strange vision that appeared to the eyes of the three men by the brook.

A hail of light enveloped the gun and showed the four numbers "broken back" outside the wheels. The arms of the gunner were extended above his head like a letter Y. No. 1 with the sponge, No. 3 over opposite, the man with the thumbstall and the man with the lanyard, which was still writhing like a snake above his head, flashed out for an instant, revealing distinctly their solemn faces, and as the light faded they sprang on the wheels to roll the gun up from its recoil. Smith uttered a low exclamation of surprise as the struggling figures melted into the darkness, but Henry Price bounded from the ground like a rubber ball and yelled at the top of his voice, "Jim, Jim Price!" Even the deaf man heard him and understood.

Henry's call was answered promptly by a voice from the hill.

"Is that you, Hank? Well, well!" And with the last word there was the crash of a body through the bushes, which made it plain that Jim was coming with leaps and bounds for an interview.

Such amazing activity in a dying man, coupled with the surprising events which had preceded and were following it, struck Smith and Spence dumb. They could only stare open mouthed at the dancing figure before them, uttering inarticulate sounds of joy which served to guide Jim through the brush to his brother.

The other gun was fired at the instant Jim burst on the scene, so that he seemed to be swept out of the darkness by the undercurrent of the shell that rushed through the night overhead.

"Doggone it!" exclaimed Jim, shaking Henry's hand limply and experimentally, as though he doubted if it were real flesh and blood. "I thought I killed you when you rolled down that bank."

"Jim," said Henry, "I've tried my best to get killed for three days because I thought I'd murdered you, and here you turn up fat and sassy with not so much as 'thank you.'"

"You're another," cried Jim. "Sound as a nut and as good as to the last."

"I'm shot through the lungs," said Henry.

"You are? You ain't!" cried Jim. "Let me feel of you." And he began fumbling about Henry's breast. "You fool, there ain't a scratch on you. You always had too much imagination.
