Praises British Army.

"Besides being well supplied with superabundance of necessary munitions, the British are now profitting by intelligent training, which they have learned from the French. Man for man, gun for gun and dollar for dollar, the French army is the finest in Europe, and it has proved a wonderful tutor for the British. At the beginning the British possessed an unlimitable stock of bravery but they were severely handicapped, by not having sufficient military instruction. At present they have not only more than enough men but also have learned to profit by their former mistakes, so that they have become a wonderful fighting machine."

British war circles concerning the fate of Roumania, Mr. Irwin said that althous had never personally visited any of the fronts east of Italy, he believed that the Roumanians would receive bufficient aid from Russia to ameliorate their present situation. He added that if the Russians who are maintaining by far the longest front could provide themse ves with the munitions and equipment they would fulfill every one's expectations. He added that because Russia possessed far more men than any of the other allies, general opinion had been censorious toward them. "It is not men which can win present day battles, but men and munitions combined with the balance of power lying with the army which can put toward the greatest supply of munitions."

Italians Quite Capable.

Mr. Irwin said that the general opinion in England was that the Germans planned to turn against Italy as sood as they had finished with Roumania. "If they open a great offensive movement against Italy they will meet with another Verdun catastrophe," continued the writer. "The Italian army is not only well equipped, but it is a great fighting machine, and what is more, they know their strength. The Italians will defend the ground they have gained until the last Italian falls. There will be no question of retreat, but of no more men to load and fire their guns."

Mr. Irwin believes that the war will continue for at least two years more and that in the end the allies will be victorious.
