

POETRY.

THE REAPER'S SONG.

The harvest is mowing on valley and plain. To the scythe and the sickle its treasures must yield; Through sunshine and shadow we've reaped the grain; Its ripe to our hand - to the field - to the field!

POLITICAL.

WHAT WILL FRANCE AND ENGLAND DO FOR POLAND? Besides the value - the true steel of the Polish troops - (and it is remarkable that, under all the disadvantages of their hasty formation, no considerable body of them has been, in any instance, dispersed or has surrendered) the advantage which they seem to possess over the Russians is in rapidity. It is by this quality that a body of men, under the guidance of an able general, gains efficiency equal to that of double the number of slower troops.

We know that it is entirely owing to the Polish rebellion that the Russian armies are not this moment on the Rhine, and invading France. Russia was prepared to invade France, and restore the Bourbons; but Poland rose in unanimous revolt, and found occupation for the Emperor's nerves. The rising of the Poles has been the means of protecting Europe from the conflagration of general war for the restoration of the old government in France. Ought not Poland, then, to be protected? It may be done now - during the crisis of the Russian reverses - by negotiation with the Emperor Nicholas; but if we wait till the despot is flushed with victory, and master of Warsaw, we shall find it impracticable. He will then be too proud to negotiate - too haughty to concede.

But, independently of all fears from the immense growth of the power of Russia, common feeling and humanity, and natural sympathy in a patriotic cause, demand the interference of England and France at this moment, to check the horrible carnage which is going on upon the banks of the Vistula.

moderation of the Emperor Nicholas, should he be permitted to crush the Poles.

Since the late settlement of Europe by the Congress in 1815, whilst all the other Powers have been fixed and stationary, Russia alone has been advancing - a multitude of people, unknown to us, have, within the last 10 years been added to the dominions of the Czar - those, for example, who inhabit the immense surface among the polar seas, which separate the north of America from Russia. Again; if we draw a line from the mouth of the Vistula across the Barysthenes to the mouth of the Volga, we shall merely draw a faint boundary of the former and more recent acquisitions of the successors of Catharine. Besides an extent of country equal to the surface of France, and situated to the westward of these rivers, another and still more unknown district on the borders of the Caspian Sea, has served to augment the mass of Russian usurpation.

Now all this multitude of people are the immediate vassals of a Government which acknowledges no law but its will; and which is at liberty to raise armies, to wage war, or to conclude peace, at its own option, without any restraint from popular assemblies, senates, or other institutions. This immense monarchy can keep armies on foot almost without the knowledge of the rest of Europe - armies nearly equal to the united forces of all the other powers, because the intercourse with Russia merely exists on a single point, whilst the relations of Russia with other States branch out into numberless ramifications.

The Emperor Alexander was friendly to peace, and anxious to hold up his own work; but there is now on the Russian throne a Prince fond of war, and anxious to distinguish himself by arms and conquest. - What measures have the Powers of Europe (England in particular) taken to keep an ambitious and warlike sovereign, wielding the resources of such an enormous empire, in check? None, unfortunately, none at all.
