before him rose a mansion fair,
With grand, aristocratic air,
Light forms were flitting to and fro,
Distinct in the bright gas-light's glow.
The ruddy flame from marble hearth,
Revealed young faces full of mirth.
And all looked bright and pure and fair,
As though an angel lingered there. Came down the steps with easy grace.
He scorned the eager, outstretched hand
Extended almost with command.
"Give! give! oh, give! on such a night,
When all to you is fair and bright.

& CHRISTMAS STORY.

A. GARDINER, IN THE BROOKLYN

Advance,

"You're almost through," the Warden said,
Pausing beside the lonely bed,
"Yes, Wardeu, yea! I'm almost through!
Just one more day to stay with you,
One more night in those gloomy halls,
And I shall be beyond the walls,
'Tis Christmas, Warden! Happy day!
I shall be free to go my way."
He seized his hand with earnest grasp,
Firmer and stronger grew the clasp.
"Warden, I can't go back to sin,
The victory I want to win.
Give me a coat to keep me warm, Give me a coat to keep me warm,
Lest I be tempted again to harm,
The wintry wind is rough and cold,
And, Warden, I am growing old.
I want to thank you, Warden, now;
You've chased the shadow from my brow; You ve chased the shadow from my brow Now, I go to the world again,
Thank God! I know there are such men I'll say Good-morning, not Good-bye,
For we're not parting, you and L''

The morning came with frosty air,
And leafless branches, brown and bare'
"Merry Christmas!" the Warden said
As he approached the dreamless bed,
"Hurrah! To day you're free, you know,
Free as the winds that keenly blow:
The law's demands you need not fear,
No hand can longer hold you here"—
But, ah! he heaved a heavy sigh,
As he received his mute renly. As he received his mute reply, For, ere he reached the silent halls, The prisoner was "beyond the walls."
