The diamond from the mine Must touch the whirling wheel; Amid terrific fires The iron turns to steel:

Must through the furnace go Round the refining gold
The seven-fold embers glow. Defiled by dross of Earth I lift mine eyes above.

To Thee-Oh hand of life And holiness, and love; Yet e'er I wing my way To that blest world on high Me, the fierce fires of grief Must burn and purify.

Come then, affliction, come With all thy mourning train, I yield, though dreading sore The anguish and the pain.

I fear:—I faint:—I fail:— The blow I fain would shun-Father-Thy will be done.

It will already be seen that Henry Evans wa a boy of peculiar disposition. As frank and generous as can be imagined, he was also pas sionate and self-willed. He was a strong, noisy boisterous, high-spirited lad, strongly ed to his mother, but often disobedient through sheer thoughtlessness. The gentle and amiable spirit of his mother was not strong enough to hold in check such a character, and the consequence was that as years passed on he grew nore and more out of the reach of her authority She did all that was in her power ; never was he out of her thoughts or her prayers, but the result of all her efforts was only painful.

Months passed on with various changes. The result of Willie's fight was good in one respect, His tormentor was subdued. Never after did he venture upon a single disrespectful word. He could go to school now without fear, and meet his old enemy without dread. Among the other boys he had suddenly acquired a great name. He had won a famous fight, and had conquered a common oppressor. He received the reward which is commonly awarded to those who win in larger battle fields. He was a chamthe reward which is com pion. Now, too, the great disparity that had existed between him and his companions had nearly disappeared. He had caught up with most of them. His eager ambition had prompted him to unusual exertion, and he had gained

If, therefore, at the end of two years he became more wayward and less teachable, more self-complacent and less-gentle, it was no more than might be expected. The teachings of his infancy had a weaker hold upon him. He loved his parents as fondly as ever, and eagerly read every letter which he received from them, and wrote back as long and lovingly as ever, but he could do many things now which once he would not have done. He was obedient and kind to his aunt Helen at home, but out of doors he had is the old story. Adversity forces us to watch and pray; prosperity, by relaxing our vigilance, renders us an easy prey to the tempter.

On one memorable day, Henry and his mother had accompanied Willie on a vacation ramble. They were passing a few days with a friend upon the banks of the Hudson. It was Sunday, and while Aunt Helen was at church, the two boys had strolled along the river bank. She had tried to induce them to accompany her, but they had already been to church once, and begged excused from going a second time. So aunt Helen had to go alone, but not before warning So aunt the boys not to go away from the grounds around

It was a beautiful day. A pleasant breeze wa blowing up the river, with sufficient freshness to temper the heat of the atmosphere, and incite pleasant thoughts of rambling.

The boys had tried to read, and to talk, and to walk about the garden. Finally they reached the gate and looked wistfully out upon the river, which flowed in all its lordly beauty just

"How I should like to have a sail," said "Wouldn't it be grand !" said Willie. "Such a splendid place to sail in."

"And such a magnificent breeze."
"We could go to the other side and be back before they come home—easily."
"Come along then; let's go," said Henry.

"What will aunt Helen say?"
"Mother won't know anything at all about

"How can we get a beat, though ?"
"There is one down on the shore just in front

At any rate," said Willie, " we can go down

Off the boys started, and in a few moments they arrived at the shore. There was a pretty little boat there, hauled up inside of a boat house. A sail was lying beside it. They looked at the admiration. Then they looked at the water, its broad expanse covered with innumerable ripples from the freshening breeze. If they were inside of that boat how merrily they oot backward and forward over the wide face of water. "I move we start off at once," said Henry "If we do, we'll be able to take a nice little sail and be back before they come home from church, whereas if we wait any longer we won't be able

Very well," said Willie.

As the boat floated from the shore, and Willie sat down to steer, he felt much trepidation. He had never managed a boat in his life. If his The Sallath School cousin had known this he would not have been so ready to have gone. But Willie had lately stracted the habit of assuming a knowledge of it was the idea of his utter ignorance of the management of a boat that now disturbed him. The bright sky, the glad sunshine, the glorious variety of hill and vale, of lowland and ing from the "Bell": precipice, of island and river, of grove and field : the music of singing birds that darted overhead; and the excitement of the swift career, all these animated him to a pitch of high enthusiasm. He sang, and laughed, and shouted out his admira tion to Willie, scolding him for not enjoying it also. He stamped with his feet on the bottom of the boat, and thrust his hand into the water as they darted through it. Willie felt no cessation of trouble. It was not fear for himself for he was no coward. But the thought that Henry, in his boundless confidence, had gaily entrusted his life to his hands, and that the life which he had thus entrusted was in jeopardy,—this made him tremble. Every laugh, every gay word, every exclamation of joy, cut him to the heart.

So he calmly took his seat, and begun to arrange the both young and old as the most interesting of Soon the boat felt the wind, and moved any held under the sanction of the Church rapidly over the water. But from the moment that Willie sat down to take the tiller his feelings were of the most painful description. The mitted to be the meeting of the month. Great care must, however, be taken that the strong wind filled the sail, and the bost, Concert should not degenerate into an exhibition. Let it be a Concert of prayer, a Concer velocity. It seemed to Willie of singing, a Concert of exhortation, in fact that any unusual gust might upset them. But whatever would tend to lead the minds of old what could he do? He clutched the tiller tight- and young from earth up to heaven and God; by and with pale face and fixed glance looked whatever would tend to lead the scholars to se straight ahead. Beneath him the boat danced their affections upon things above, whether over the waves, now heeling far over, now right- prayer, singing, exhortation, or recitation of over the waves, now healing is over, now right ing hiersell, and rushing through the water with wonderful speed. His cousin sat in front of him with his back God would own and bless to the salvation of

I was present at the last Concert held by the Portland Baptist Sabbath School, on the 3r inst. The exercises were commenced by the ing from the "Bell":

Dear friends with joy we meet you here,

On this our festive day, To bless God for the Sabbath School,

O join our simple lay.

The Superintendent (and a noble-hearted one he is) then read the 34th Psalm, and after a fee moments spent in silent prayer, the children re maining seated with their heads inclining for ward, he addressed the throne of grace, beseech ing a blessing upon their labors. Amen being pronounced, the children struck up,

Joyfully, joyfully onward we move, Bound to the land of bright spirits above.

Then Brother Cady appeared with his quar terly report, which was exceedingly interesting shewing a large portion of the scholars and Teachers to have been present every Sabbath. In some of the classes every scholar had recited seemed. It was not much more than half a mile, the Ten Commandments; in other classes portion of them had done so. Other portions of Scripture had been committed to m "Why in the world don't you speak, Willie? all about 1300 verses; and over half the School the children arose and, in the language of their melodicus song, invited all to come to their Sunday School. Brother Cady followed with few remarks. He first asked if any of the children knew any one in China. There was a general response, "Mr. Jenkins," (their forme pastor, but now a missionary in that coun'ry. Mr. Cady then told them where China was situated, its population, what the people live on what they wear, their dwellings " No, no, we must turn. Aunt Helen is back society there, and promised to tell them much from meeting by this time. We must turn and more at some future time. Another sweet song from the children was then sung. A visitor in a "Why she can't be back yet. It's only a few short speech, pointed out what might result from the efforts of the children to bring their co npan-"A few minues! It's an hour."

"Never mind, we must turn now. Besides, I don't feel very well."

Henry sat discontentedly holding on to the sail. He had a general idea of the management of a boat, in fact he knew far more about it than Willie. As the boat turned to obey the rudder, he shifted the rope of the sail as beat as he could. But it was very clumsily done. The could. But it was very clumsily done. The sang two verses of the hymn, "I want to be an boat stopped half way and tossed violently. Neither of the boys spoke, Willie held the helm tightly, and sat in fearful suspense. But at length the danger was averted, and the bost was fairly about and headed towards home.

Willie gave a sigh of relief and with his eyes fixed carnestly upon the house which they had left he, prepared for the homeward passage. But now the wind had freshmed with the mid-ship had a freshmed with the mid-shi ger, but Henry had not the slightest idea of any auch thing. He was still more delighted with the rough motion and lay down on his back in the middle of the boat with his legs on a seat, the middle of the boat with his leg the middle of the beat with his legs on a seat, and his hands still holding on to the rope.

The wind increased. The ill managed boat yielded to every gust; the increasing waves dashed over the bows. Sometimes the boat further contains the boat will real over so far that the water would dash
