SPRING CLEANING.

Extract from "My Experiences of Spring Cleanings, Past and Present."

The pleasant streets of that dear old town

And my youth comes back to me.

But so surely as I indulge in those long, long thoughts of my youth, with all its happiness, with all its freedom from care, with all its manifold pleasures, and its few pains, there arises in my mind's eye the vivid picture of one very great minery, which used to befall my yearly within the precincts of the beautiful town that is seated by the sea." The picture is that of an annual irruption known as "Spring Cleaning," when every vestige of comfort would disappear from the home of my childhood in dear old Weymouth town. Spring Cleaning in those days was Spring Cleaning with a vengeance. The Assyrian that came down like a wolf on the fold was tame in comparison with it. So soon as every March had come in like a lion and had gone out more or less like the proverbial lamb—sometimes he came in like a lion and went out like a tiger—and alion and went out the analyse of the search of ness of their homes, other responsible occupations pressing heavily upon them.

As I am not by any means a credulous person, and believe in scarcely anything that I hear, I determined to test the powers of Sunlight Soap myself. My first action was to turn the bath-room into a wash-house. To the consternation of the housemaid, who had expressed a wish to leave upon having been found fault with for not keeping the china as bright as we wished, I bade her half fill the bath with nearly cold water, and cut up some little junks of the Sunlight Soap, and throw them into the bath. We next collected many of our heaviest pieces of China, Antony and Cleopatra, Lady Godiva, a large yellow cat with blue spots, the Dresden bull, a large litter of pigs, an immense monkey devouring a pomegranate—the guardian angel of our hall—numerous busts, notably of Napoleon the Great, Wesley, Thackeray, Henry Irving, Don Quixote, George Cruickshank, and Cardinal Manning; the Florentine Boar in alabaster, and a Giraffe from an unknown ceramic pottery, and smeared them well over with grated Sunlight Soap. Then they all went into the bath together. I locked the door, putting the, key in my pocket, and went -back to my study and wrote a "Scrutator" for they all went into the bath together. I locked the door, putting the key in my pocket, and went -back to my study and wrote a "Scrutator" for "Truth" on Registry Offices for Servants, which, candor compels me to admit, the editor would not accept on account of its acerbity. I could not modify my views, believing as I do that Registry Offices have, in a very large measure, contributed to the present unsatisfactory state of the domestic service market; so I treasure that article still, although it has never appeared in print. In three hours I returned to my Companions of the Bath, rang for the housemaid, who was decidedly supercilious because a new experiment was being made that she did not wish or intend to approve of, and directed her to draw off the water, which I noticed with exultation was nearly block. She then refulled the hath ing made that she did not wish or intend to approve of, and directed her to draw off the water, which I noticed with exultation was nearly black. She then refilled the bath with lukewarm water, drew it off again after a few minutes, and, hey presto! there were the mottey occupants of the bath as clean and as bright as new pins. We took them up tenderly, lifted them with care, and laid them out on macintosh sheets on the floor to dry, and quickly I put into the bath a second Happy Family, cleansing them by the same simple process. The next day we immersed several more batches, and for the first time our collection of china washed itself without any physical labor on our parts beyond that, as we restored the pieces to their accustomed haunts, they were lightly and swiftly rubbed up with new chamois leathers. But china washing was not everything, I argued. Sunlight Soap was advertised as a sweet boon to the weary washerwoman of curtains, blankets, table-covers, and, in fact, everything appertaining to a household matters; and I only speak myself up as an authority upon household matters; and I only speak myself up as an authority upon household matters; and I only speak myself up as an authority upon household matters; and I only speak from my own experience of them. I contend that there are thousands of working folks like myself whose occupations do not allow them to vacate their houses at all hours and seasons, when the necessary cleanings are on; but there is no earthly reason why, in these days, our templet, and the affections of our husbands temporarily estranged from us, on the miscries of discomfort they are enduring because their favorite rooms and all their surroundings are in the thralls for days, nay, weeks together of that over-powering field "Spring Cleaning." We women can all choose exactly that soap and those implements of follow our chosen methods and not their own—which are apt to be beautifying and pertaining to a household matters; and I only self work whose of working folks like myself whose ov soap in each bundle, and left them and one acids so valued by our chile I returned to my paste-pot an scissors, intent upon cutting sub-

That next evening, when Mr. Warren and his mother were dining at Kingsley Manor, Vivian was just a little startled by a sudden question from her grandfather. "What did Christie Conway say when you handed her the money, Vivian?" And Stelle Warren thought he never had seen anything so lovely as the fleeting flush and pure pallor on her face.

"She was very grateful, grandpa. She sent word she could never express her thanks."

"A nice little girl," Mr. Kingsley said, approvingly.

And Stelle Warren said to himself that Vivian was a nicer. "So, the sewing was through you, telle?

I might almost have known it, you used to be so thoughtful, always. I do so thank you-I need all I can get to do." Christie Conway looked up into Mr. Warren's grave, pitiful face, and his very heart ached to see what that year and a-half of married misery had done for her. "I heard you were in distress, Christie, but I did not dream you were so breken

"He has not sent it! Why, did not Vivian Kingsley bring it to you yesterday?" "Vivian Kingsley was here yesterday, and left me a bowl of jelly and a bottle of port wine and a basket of apples."

Warren looked surprised, and was silent "That is strange-very strange," he said in a curious tone of voice. "But it need make no difference, Christie. You and I are old friends, and you will not refuse the nvitation my mother sends—to bring your ittle white Lilly and visit us at Warren Grange, until we decide your future."

A gush of passionate tears streamed down her pale face. "You are a saint! Oh. Stelle. I dare not refuse for my baby's sake. And if we both get well and strong, I can so easily earn nough to pay you back." A week later—the day of Mrs. Louison's grand affair—and Vivian Kingsley, radiant case smiling at the charming reflection "I never looked so well, and I wonder if -to-night-he will not tell me that he loves as a fairy queen, stood before her dressing-

Her beautiful face was all aflush and sparkle as she leisurely dr. w on her white ace-topped kid gloves, waiting for the roll of the carriage wheels, that meant Stelle Warren had come for her.

When her maid handed her a note, aud discreetly retired while Vivian read this: "MISS KINGSLEY: I must beg to be excused from attending you to Mrs. Louison's. For two reasons. Oue, I have learned that you are not the girl of high honor and absolute truthfulness I thought you were. The other, my betrothed wife, Mrs. Christie this time. STELLE WARREN." So the lovely white swiss toilet, with its glistening snowy jet and shining satin, was a ruinous investment, and to Vivian it was a robe of sackcloth ever after.
