THE BETROTHAL: OR, TOW MR. QUINT WAS ENGAGED, AND AT LAST SUCCEEDED IN GETTING MARRIED. Translated for the Evening Post, Translated for the Evening Post.

We left poor Quint at the close of the last chapter, making a rapid geological exploration down the sand hill. Poor Quint?

When in a poetic position, (which can glorify mankind, and make a heaven of each,) some prosaic incident occurs, who, that hast the feedings of a lamb, would not be angry? And yet the poor life of man is but a romance mingled with verse, an opera without music, a thing out of which few draw any siedom, and therefore it happ no that even the most gentle souls, become sometimes fierce, and shake their silk wool like a lone's mane.

This Mr. Quint did, as the happily raised hisself in his feet at the foot of the mountain, at decaped the assaults of various rolling stones by scienific jumps. But, in the midst of the anger, he knew not whether to curse most his misfortune, or thank m-st his good tuck, for having accomplished his audacious descent without breaking an areo or a leg.

or hank m'st his good uca, it has a his adactous descent without breaking an arm or a leg.

Climbic g the mount in again, and seeking Bessie, was not to be thought of. Probably the good child had wisely saved herself by flight, during the horrible avalauche. Beside, Mr. Quint could not conceal it that he black silk breaches were not in a state to show to the eyes of his beloved. He ought to be happy, if he could hide the spots and rents in them, and reach his home in broad day without being seen.

He cried with rage! Even philosophers loore their philosophy under certain circusstances.—
There has no man yet been found, wise in every hour of the day. Mr. Quint, the Bruyers and Theophrast of his vale, Mr. Quint, the Bruyers and Theophrast of his vale, Mr. Quint, so learned in human nature, would certainly not have brought those tears in the account, had he described his own character. And yet it would have been the truth! But such tears are not shed in the market place nor at the tratable.

The following day. Mr. Puk appeared at Quint's table-cloth—dear deeven, it is just as if it had no happened, and does not entice one to the meal.—

When the heart is not warm, the dishes are cold."
"You are quite right," returned Mr. Quint, and his countenance brightened; "I feet that you have poken truly. But it is difficult now to find a good girl, who will be drawn to the after by a man's heart. And I kn w no maiden with whom I could be happy, to speak openly—but your beautiful neice, Miss Bessie." Mr. Quint lost his breath at the last word.

Mr. Pyk laughed relici us ly. He lighted the pipe again, and saif, "So soon ?"

Quint bent, and raised a paper-tolder from the Quint bent, and raised a paper-tolder from the Ground. The rubican was passed; he no longer dared go backward.

"Stop:" screamed Mr. Pyk, "there you are wrong. Such a thing must be done quickly, Lazy quickly, but in proper order. There are things in the world that must be taken quickly to have the masteced, to wit: a medicine, an assemble and a wife. Just so with christening, marriage and burial. These are the three shapters in the book of life, or the tittes of a chapter, that are all much alike. By haptism, we renounce the devil; by marriage, old Adam; and by death, all teats and sorrow. Awen. It remains with you. The betrothal can be made a year hence, if you like."

"No!" said Mr. Quint, "by my body it shall not. Do as you will, I commit sysself to you entirely. I am the happiest creature under the sun. I have naught in the world against the betrothal, but on'y against the pompous display of parson, lawyer, and witnesses. I hate out nation, complimenting, one emonious airs. Cansol I then take a wife to myself without all that bustle ?"
