More than this, she had also made a new will, in which she had divided, as she had said she would, her possessions equally between him and Belle, and thus unexpectedly the young man found himself the fortunate possessor and heir in prospect of at least three-quarters of a million dollars. During these three weeks, when not busy with matters of law, Miss Kayanagh had done everything could think of to make his visit delightrul, but the day came at last when Kenneth felt that he must leave—he had delayed longer than the intended, and was becoming impatient to get back to Queen Bess, from whom he had not neard during the last two or three weeks. Isabelle was not at all reconciled to this separation; she declared that she could not give up her dear brother, when she had just found him, and only when Miss Kavanagh promised that they would fol-low him to America in the autumn, where, if she liked, she should enter where, if she liked, she should enter Vassar to complete her education, and where she had herself graduated, did the smiles return to her usually sunny face. It was the middle of July when Kenneth finally bade them farewell. He tenderly kissed the tears from his sister's face, and then turned with outstretched hand and then turned with outstretched hand to her aunt. "Good-bye, Miss Kavanagh," he said; "you have made my stay at Shannondale very pleasant, and I feel very grateful to you for many things."

The proud woman's lip trembled, and as he clung to his hand she said wistfully:

"Kenneth-I am your father's sister."
He bent and touched her forehead in a farewell caress, then was gone, leaving them both feeling as if half the light of the day had departed with him.

A few years ago, it must be J. acknowledged, while this city was peroutside towns. Perhaps pennants and trophies were won, but the game was not worth the throw. The Canadian Baseball League faded away, and for some time it was thought that the game had gone with it, as far as London was concerned. A number of hard-working nthusiasts, most of whom were from the different factories and wholesales. got together and started a movement towards a baseball resurrection in London. The result was that besides the City League a wholesale league was formed. Both organizations received more than expected patronage and the object of the men who worked the idea towards the awakening of London from its baseball sleep was accomplished. So marked was the success that it is to be wondered at that the hockeyists employed at factories and wholesales do not follow the same of their journey. The way lay close along the river bank, and under other circumstances the drive would have been ly relations between employed and ly relations between employed and employer would be marked, and as the sport is quite as popular as baseball, such a movement would be attended with the same success. To a good start Glenden-ning, a 15-to-1 shot, rushed out in front and opened up a gap, being eight lengths in from of his field at one time. He sea team was in every way superior and held the Canadians down from the start. The game had hardly begun when the Welshmen scored. The playing of the Canadians is very variable. One day they make a good showing and the next they are away off. This was an off-day. They were several times penalized and their actions throughout were listless. DuMoulin, Britton, Phillips and Darling were the only one; who seemed to be trying; the other: were asleep. Gillespie missed scoring through his inactivity; Farrell, who is usually good, missed everything that came along, and Craig never seemed able to get going.
