In the large manufacturing cities this is especially true, where the constant discharge of soot and smoke from the huge chimneys forms a real economic problem for citizens. In the case of Pittsburg, for instance, hundreds of dollars yearly are expended in window-cleaning, interior renovating, and outside cleaning of buildings, an expense that is done away with in smaller places, where no factories exist. Other items in the cost of living, made higher by the effect of smoke, are wear. ing apparel, laundry, curtain material, and, in the shops, damage to goods. Electric light bills are also much larger in Pittsburg than some other cities because of the murky atmosphere occa-

Many of the buildings now were constructed of glazed tile or vitrified brick in place of sandstone and limestone formerly used for public buildings. This was on account of the softer stone being so quickly affected by the atmospheric gases caused by smoke.
