A STRIKING LEGACY.

(From London Truth.)

The verses recited at a dinner hall to hear the reading of an Umbel hall will, after his funeral, included all the nearest relatives of the deceased, and it happened to be individuals so diverse in their parents and characters that it was only in such a place and for such a purpose that they could have met at all. But all were equally interested in the circumstances that had brought them together, for Mr. Umbel had died a childless widower, and his large property was divided among his three, and his wife, who had never favored him, had been a cold, stern, unattractive old man, living much alone, and had never favored his wife with any of his money.

It was generally anticipated that his estate would be divided among his three children, Mr. Umbel's son, Mr. Umbel's daughter, and Mr. Umbel's daughter. But the will was found to have been made by the deceased, and it was found to have been made by the deceased, and it was found to have been made by the deceased.

Mrs. Gloam and Mrs. Calligore had both come with their husbands to the funeral, and there were also present the other relatives of the deceased, and the will was found to have been made by the deceased, and it was found to have been made by the deceased.

It was found that the will was made by the deceased, and it was found to have been made by the deceased, and it was found to have been made by the deceased.

Dr. Grinning, and at last the passage that he had made, and at last the passage that he had made, and at last the passage that he had made, and at last the passage that he had made, and at last the passage that he had made.

And I, who had been a witness to the will, and I, who had been a witness to the will, and I, who had been a witness to the will, and I, who had been a witness to the will, and I, who had been a witness to the will.

It was found that the will was made by the deceased, and it was found to have been made by the deceased, and it was found to have been made by the deceased.

Mrs. Gloam and Mrs. Calligore had both come with their husbands to the funeral, and there were also present the other relatives of the deceased, and the will was found to have been made by the deceased.

It was found that the will was made by the deceased, and it was found to have been made by the deceased, and it was found to have been made by the deceased.
