REV. J. W. PEDLEY

Deals With the Early Closing Movement.

Rev. J. W. Pedley took for his text, Philippians, il., xiv.: "Look not every man on his own things, but also on the things of another," and dealt with the movement for early closing.

In this text is the essence of Christlanity. Self-interest requires interest in others. Who helps others, helps nimself. "Look out for No. 1" is not only :ean and selfish; it is suicidal. To follow it out would mean ruin in business, in society, in the home, in the soul. Exchange of products is the law, not only of trade, but of life. Exports must balance imports. Each life is a center-a clearance bank. Blessings pass in and out. Stop that circulation, and the life perishes. Nations furnish examples. Britain and Spain were great colonizers. Spain's policy was, "Look out for No. 1." Today she East End Whist Club and the Oregons is kicked out of everywhere and hated was played in the latter's rooms, East by all. Britain adopted a different line and is today the center of a worldsulted in a victory for the Oregons wide empire. by 72 points. Sixteen players from each club participated in the match.

This Christian law today calls for translation in terms of social service. The world is becoming more crowded, interests more closely intertwined, men more dependent. The railroad manager cannot overlook the telegraph operator, the business man his cierks, the manufacturer his employes, the public, any of them. Goodwill among men is no longer a religious luxury; it is a necessity. Most people believe this and practice it. But there is still enough selfishness to prevent the wheels of life from running smoothly. This idea of early closing is an example of social service. It is a Christian problem and deserves Christian study. It is a question of humanity. Some say it is not a matter for the pulpit. Christ would not say it. His gospel was not a gospel divorced from the earthly welfare of

The ground of our appeal is that of its humanity. We ask those who pay weekly wages to pay early in the week; those who spend them to do so before Saturday night; those who are people to church on Sunday morning; but that an army of workers, which has been toiling from Monday morning, may not have an extra strain on Saturday night. London is a Christian city. The people are kind-hearted. It is a shame, a disgrace, that through thoughtless selfishness, hundreds, late Saturday night and early Sunday morning, are kept at needless work. And there are selfish merchants who grudge the loss of a passing sale. They break the compact. For such there should be law. The sentiment of the community should take that form. It is outrageous that one or two selfish men should bar out the benefit of a whole class. Early closing can succeed. Examples are, Eaton, of Toronto; Corswell, Montreal.

The preacher closed by appealing to his hearers to do what they could. It would all help to bring about the good time-a new heaven and a new earth.

A short poem from his pen appeared in Harper's Magazine last month and his work has been noticed by other leading periodicals. Notes" of February contains a handsome photogravure of Mr. Stringer, accompanied by the following complimentary reference: Arthur Stringer is one of the younger Canadian poets. He is an Oxford man, and perhaps his most scholarly work is his Shakespearian studies. In an exhaustive study of King Lear, first published in the American Shakespeare Magazine, he attempts to establish the dual character of Cordelia, arguing that Cordelia and the fool are the same person. The hypothesis is new in Shakespearian criticism and created considerable discussion. His novel conception of Lady Macbeth's character also attracted attention. Shakespeare in Oxford and Shakespeare the Accidental are the work of his pen. Springer has published three volumes of verse, "Watches of Twilight," "Epigrams" and "Pauline and Other While an undergraduate at Oxford Mr. Stringer wrote his poem on Shelley, which Prof. Alexander has given a place in his anthology.

VERY SATISFACTORY

Bradstreet's Review of the State o Trade in Canada.

Toronto, Feb. 13.—Bradstreet's weekly review of Canadian wholesale trade savs: Business at Montreal the past week was very satisfactory for the season. Payments have been good this month, and the number of failures have been comparatively small. Wholesale business is, generally speaking, in a sound condition, and the prospects are decidedly promising. Active prepara-tions are to begin soon for shipping, and it is thought the coming season will be even more prosperous in this tence, and the police magistrate sent respect than last year. Business in goods for the spring is very good; some large shipments have already been made, and the distributing houses here will make further large shipments this month.

The prospects for trade in the Northwest are very promising, and a large business with that part of the country is expected to be done this year.

The markets at the Pacific coast are quiet, but the outlook for trade on the opening of spring was never more encouraging. A great deal of capital is into various enterprises on this coast. Building operations the coming season will probably be on a larger scale than every before, and the demand in all lines of wholesale trade promises to show a large expansion. Business at Toronto has been fair the past week, and the spring trade done shows a good business. The cold weather this week has shown a tendency to check retail sales. This is rather a dull month for the retailers, anyhow, being between seasons, and it is not expected that country remittances will during the next few weeks be very satisfactory. The market for various lines is very firm, however, and the outlook for the wholesale trade was never better. The reports from travelers at the coast, Manitoba and the Northwest, are very satisfactory, and indicate a large increase in trade with that part of the country the next few months. The curling bonspiel brought many buyers from Manitoba entry points to Winnipeg this week, and a good deal of spring business has been done. The weather has been severe this month, but an increased movement in staple goods is expected when the temperature goes higher. In the country, though higher prices were offered for wheat, there was very little grain being marketed by farmers, owing to the severe weather. Between now and spring, however, there should be larger marketings of wheat than since the close of navigation.
