of Her Story. I closed the door of the living room, switched on the light and walked over to the huddled, shrinking figure of my friend.

"Don't try to talk just yet unless you must," I said, slipping my arm around her and drawing her head to my shoulder. One glance into her eyes, wide opened, burning with horror, had told me that she was laboring under a nerve strain which it was highly advisable to lessen if possible.

She turned her face against my arm, clutching at my hands with fingers that trembled convulsively.

"I—Lemust_talk you," she schedd "Tourner" to the humanizing of her eyes, which had looked before like those of some wild thing trapped.

Her lips parted in attempted speech, but I interposed quickly.

"Not a word yet," I said, dipping the towel in the cool water and beginning to lave her face. I kept up my ministrations until the dry heat left her eyes lids and I felt her relax comfortably against me.

"Thank—you," she said a little later, raising her head. "I—am—perfectly—all—right—now, and—you—must—listen."

clutching at my hands with fingers that trembled convulsively.

"I—I—must—tell—you—" she choked, then her overstrained composure gave way, and she began to sob—violent, shuddering sobs that wracked her whole slender body.

I slipped my fingers to her eyes cautiously in the hope that the blessed relief of tears had come to her, but her eyes were dry and hot. And then I sat holding her closely, tensely, straining my ears for some slight sound which should tell me that my motherin-law had kept her word and had put a glass of restorative outside the door.

At last it came, the merest wraith of a sound, but I recognized it. I waited until she had time to go unstains.

At last it came, the merest wraith of a sound, but I recognized it. I waited until she had time to go upstairs again, then I slipped away from Alica and opened the door to find not only the glass I had expected, but a basin of tool perfumed water and a small towel. With a silent blessing upon my irascible but sterling mother-in-law for her thoughtfulness I took the things back to my, friend's side and put my hand upon her head, which had slipped to the arm of the chair when I had left her. The sobs were quieted now, but there was something about the listless figure that alarmed me.

"Here, dear, lift your head for me," I commanded peremptorily.

She obeyed me but I sow that the cause of her death?"
"Her physician says it was."

"Here, dear, lift your head for me," I commanded peremptorily.

She obeyed me, but I saw that her lips had lost their color and that her face was grey, while her hands were cold.

"Drink this." I held the pungent liquid to her lips, knowing that if it were the mixture usually favored by my mother-in-law in emergencies it was strong enough for the effect I that the cause of her death?"

"Wher physician says it was."

"When did it happen?" It seemed to me that my own heart almost stopped beating while I waited for her answer.

"Quite late this afternoon. I didn't happened. What train did you take in?" she broke off abruptly.

I told her, adding the information that I had just missed the one before. my mother-in-law in emergencies it was strong enough for the effect I wished.

The Adventures of Jimmy Coon

MR. PORCUPINE TAKES THE TWO FRIENDS FOR A TREAT. Jimmy Coon was very quick and and if there isn't something good to clever to jump so swiftly and knock eat at the end of this road we aren't Tommy Fisher over and save Quilly Porcupine's life. And Quilly was very grateful, so he tried to think of some way to show Jimmy Coon that he was thankful.

way to show Jimmy Coon that he was thankful.

So one day he asked Jimmy Coon and Teddy Possum to go with him, as he had something lovely for them to eat, "the very best thing in the world there is to eat," said Quilly Porcupine, and Jimmy Coon's bright eyes sparkled with joy, for he loves something good to eat, and who doesn't, only those people who haven't any teeth or any aple who haven't any teeth or any apple who haven't any teeth or any appetites left?

So Quilly set off through the forest, and Teddy Possum and Jimmy Coon were with him, and they could hardly wait for that lovely surprise. They wondered what it could be and talked Wong's Cafe

Through the trees they saw after a while the remains of a fire, and it looked as if people had just broken talking and on this day he never said a world. Quilly couldn't go very fast, and his two friends got very impatient, and very tired of going at such a slow pace.

You ought to have seen Jimmy Coon and Teddy Possum hurry to that camp.
