"Of course not, but mnm's the word, understand?" said the banker, and in another moment a half dozen of his brother financiers had seized upon him, and Paul Berrian was left to his own devices.

Deeper and damper settled the rainy gloom of the panic Friday, and the faces Paul met on arriving at the office of his employers were all in keeping with the weather, while crowds of gloomy men hurried to and fro through the muddy streets, hunted hither and thither by the omnipresent spectre of bankruptcy. But Paul Berrian's thoughts were busy with the spectre of the street, for he knew only too well how surely he would come, that day, to the broker's office wherein he earned his modest salary, and how other men would recognize the grizzly presence, and how friends and foes alike would mutter "Bankruptcy" and turn away for fear they might themselves look the destroyer in the face.

A blue enough morning for Paul, in spite of all his brave little wife had said to cheer him up before he left her, since he thought, indeed, that not even Poverty himself, Bankruptcy's grim twin brother, would have power to chill his courage, were it not for Madeline and their bright-eyed boy. He tried not to think of them, as he sat there in the crowded car, but their faces came before him perpetually, and with them came also an active state of the all and the look.
