Standing at the side of the King, the Prime Minister commented upon the changes which a hundred years have brought ^{in Canada} in the relations of the Crown and its advisers. It must have been a moment of deep satisfaction to a heart burning for the ideals of Liberty and Justice.

When I visited King, he showed me the 1837 proclamation. At its side, ^{similarly framed, in now} there ~~was~~ another ~~document,~~ ^{document,} ~~similarly framed~~ Canada's declaration of war, dated September 10, 1939. It bears the signature of the great grandson of Queen Victoria and the signature of the grandson of the rebel Mackenzie. What a source of reflection, I thought, for a ^{man} ~~man~~ who ~~never forgets~~ ^{never forgets} the struggles and privations of his ancestors. Here was his King. There was his ~~maternal~~ grandfather. And as we turned to the door of the library, he faced the picture of his mother, the radiant influence of his life.
