CHAPTER XI.

During the next few weeks, Larcher saw much of Mr. Turl. The Kenbys, living under the same roof, saw even more of him. It was thus inevitable that Edna Hill should be added to his list of new acquaintances. She declared him "nice," and was not above trying to make Larcher a little jealous. But Turl, beyond the amiahility which he had for everybody was not of a coming-on disposition. Sometimes Larcher fancied there was the slightest addition of tenderness to that amiability when Turl regarded or spoke to, Florence Kenby. But, if there was, nobody need wonder at it. The new-comer could not realize how permanently and entirely another for him to find that out-if his feelings indeed concerned themselves with her-when those feelings should take hope and dare expression. Meanwhile it was nobody's place to warn

If poor Davenport's image remained as living as ever in Florence Kenby's heart, that was the only place in New York where it did remain so. With Larcher, it went the course of such images: occupied less and less of his thoughts, grew more and more vague. He no longer kept up any pretence of inquiry. He had ceased to call at police headquarters and on Mrs. Haze. That good woman had his adddess "in case anything turned up." She had rented Davenport's room to a new lodger; his hired piano had been removed by the owners. and his personal belongings had been packed away unclaimed by heir or made for you?
