Shooting an Oil Well.

With bugle and brass bands, playing alternately, the regiment paraded on Petrolea street, which was gaily dec-orated with flags and bunting, and lined on either side by hundreds of people, numbers of whom had come in from the surrounding country for the day. After a smart parade, the regi- Notes by the Way. was drawn up on the bridge which divides the east from the west town, opposite a large tract of oil About fifty yards away, in full view of all, a big well on the prop-erty of Mr. J. E. Armstrong, M. P., blown up with a huge charge of nivro-glycerine, for the benefit of the spectators, who stood at a safe distance roundabout on all sides. Since many of the members of the Seventh had never seen an oil well blasted before, the sight proved a great attraction to the Londoners. Four-inch piping had been sunk 500 feet into the well previously, and at the bottom lay 40 pounds of nitro-glycerine. Far more of the deadly explosive than necessary was used, for the sake of making a better display. When Dave Porter and James McDermid touched off the long fuse which extended from the top to the bottom of 'the well, the Seventh watched with close attention. In a minute a muffled boom, seeming to come from the bowels of the earth, was heard. Then a black stream of oil, water and mud, shot up 400 feet into the air, and gradually subsided, well was then quickly connected with big collecting tank, Mr. Armstrong himself, who was an interested spectator, said that about 300 barrels of oil had come out during the first five min-
