Dear Steve,
 I often see you from a distance, and hope you'll show no resistance.
 I see you candy,
 and bottles of wine, Please now Steve, won't you be mine.
 Love T.C.

If you fail to pay your rent on the date it is due, you landlord has the the right to notify to quit, that is, an eviction order. You should receive a copy of th complaint your landlord gives to the Rentalsman. The Rentalsman will investigate the complaint, and if you have not paid your rent, the notice to quit will be issued. The first time this occurs, you have seven days from the date the notice to quit is served to pay the rent which is owing. If you pay in full to the Office of the Rentalsman, you will not have to vacate you apartment, but you will not be given this opportunity a second time.

What happens if I violate some other term of my lease?

Should you breach a term of your lease other than the payment of rent, your landlord will serve you with a notice stating his or her complaint. Similarly, if your landlord breaches a term of the lease, you must serve notice stating your complaint. After receiving such a notice, you or your landlord will have seven days to correct the problem. If the breach is not rectified after that time, the complaint can then be forwarded to the Rentalsman, who will investigate and take whatever action is deemed appropriate.

How should notice be served?

Notices as described above may be delivered personally or may be mailed. If the mail is used, notice is deemed to have been served on the third day after the date of mailing. It is important to add three additional days to the minimum notice requirement.
 While it is not necessary, sending a notice by registered mail may help to avoid disputes at a later date. It is also acceptable to serve notice by leaving it in the mailbox or sliding it under the door of the recipient.
