

and, "China, its State and Prospects," by Dr. W. H. Medhurst.

The Author also expresses his fervent thanks to his revered friend, the Rev. J. C. Bruce, D.D., for having kindly allowed him the use of several letters written by Dr. Morrison, which have not previously been published, and for having permitted him to extract a few facts of interest from an unpublished lecture on "Morrison and Chinese Missions," given by him in Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1859.

While Newcastle has not been backward in honouring the memory of several of its great townsmen, it is astonishing that it has never erected a statue or even a tablet, or, better still, established a benevolent institution as a memorial of the name and character of Robert Morrison: What citizen of the good old town has better deserved such honour?
