

Fat is absolutely necessary as an article of diet. If it is not of the right kind it may not be digested. Then the body will not get enough of it. In this event there is fat-starvation.

Scott's Emulsion supplies this needed fat, of the right kind, in the right quantity, and in the form already partly digested.

As a result all the organs and tissues take on activity.

IN SAFE-KEEPING.

Have courage, timid soul, nor be afraid. Because before the shadowy scenes the way:

A change upon His angel God hath laid.

To hold thee in safe-keeping; wherefore they watch over thee, unseen, by night and day.

Look back across the levels thou hast trod.

And count the perils thou hast passed unharmed;

When failed those faithful ministers of God.

To guard thee from the foe against thee armed?

Why, then, since they are with thee, be alarmed!

—Ave Maria.

YOUR DANGER NOW

Is from the overlooked condition of the liver and kidneys which are unable to expel impurities from the blood. This causes rheumatism. Eddy's Sarsaparilla has been wonderfully successful in curing this disease. It neutralizes the acid in the blood and permanently cures the sores and pains which other medicines fail to relieve.

Mary Gainer's Inheritance.

MARY CATHERINE CROWLEY IN AFRICA.

Mrs. Gainer patted the pretty brown hair and took up her story:

"Well, to begin at the beginning, my dear. A poor Irish boy, deprived by the effect of the old penal laws of much schooling, Peter Gainer emigrated to this country thirty-six years ago some next Lady Day; he told me the date years ago, and it has never slipped my memory; being not long since I let home my self, though I had no knowledge there was such a lad in the world at the time. A man from the one town with him was known to have come to Philadelphia. Hither accordingly Peter made his way soon after landing at Castle Garden. He hunted up this whilom acquaintance, but neither one of them was able to obtain steady employment. When the tide of their fortunes was at its lowest ebb, they fell in with an over-seer who had come to the city to hire men to work a new coal mine up in Clarion County. Gladly they went with him; and thereafter, during the best of his manhood, Peter toiled in the mines.

"The house where he boarded—a rude but decent place—was kept by the widow of a miner who had been killed by an explosion of fire-damp. She was my sister, and I had come out to her from the old country; for, with five small children, she needed my help badly. So 'twas here Peter and I first met. He was a fine, stalwart young fellow and I—well, I was not altogether ill-looking, and had more than one string to my bow,"—and she sighed with a woman's retrospective satisfaction in her youthful strivings.

"Oh, yes!" exclaimed Mary, humbling the little innocent vanity.

"I have heard father say that you were the loveliest collier in all the country round when he first saw you; and as happy-hearted, industrious, and pious too, that not even the roughest of the men thereabouts ever failed in respect to Margaret Darcy. And he still boasts of having won your favor over half a dozen rivals; although you might have done regretfully, you might have done better from a worldly point of view."

"God guided my choice, and I have never wished it had been otherwise," returned the mother, while her eyes grew dim as she recalled her husband's loyal affection during all the years since then.

"Peter and I were married in the village church," she went on; "and set up housekeeping in a cabin not far from the entrance to the mine. He was hardworking and steady, and I did my best to be economical and thrifty. Almighty God prospered us; for we strove to serve Him, and did not forget those who were poorer than ourselves. Ere long we were able to remove to a better house; and here you came to me, slaves. Peter often told me that some-times in the depths of the mines, besides the rough masses of coal, are to be found beautiful forms of delicate ferns and foliage that once he longed to the world above them, yet were placed by God amid the darkness of that lower earth for His own good sake."

"Yes! mean the plant forms found in the coal shafts?"

"Yes. Well, my darling, like to them amid the rudeness of our life you seemed to me. But had Peter been a laborer in a diamond mine instead of a miserable coal pit, and had he become possessed of the grandest jewel that ever graced a royal crown, he could not have felt prouder than he was of you; and it was the same with me."

"Indeed, mother, you have ever loved me almost too fondly—been too good to me—"

"No; but thenceforth our one worldly thought was to plan and save for you. As the years passed we had managed to lay by a snug sum, and I persuaded my husband to sell a small farm in the wilds, thinking I might clear it off by degrees; and then the land would be worth, I thought, what we gave for it. Alack! how little we could count upon the future! All might have been well for Peter's health was good and his place secure; but there came the accident—he was lame for life; he could no longer work in the mine, and all the money we owned had been sunk in those few acres of waste mountain land."

"It was my fault," but Peter never spoke a word of blame. The farm, however, at least gave us a roof of our own over our heads, and there we went. The fine air, and being out of doors so much, helped him wonderfully; but he did not get back his full strength, and could not fill the soil enough to get more than a wretched living out of it. Then, too, he began to be anxious about you. He said you were growing up there as wild as a little mountain rose; and, if he could not give you anything else, he must provide so that you should have a fair education."

"Dear father!" ejaculated the listener.

"And so the end of it all was, Mrs. Gainer proceeded, glad to be nearly through with her tale, yet with a strange interest only dimly perceived by Mary. "As he was hurt in the mine, one of the doctors took an interest, and through influence with the railroad, got him this place as night-watchman here in Philadelphia—a place he has kept here ever since."

"His brother Michael rented the farm from me for a small sum, which, in faith, has not been paid regularly. Peter would have said it to him for almost nothing; but Michael laughed and said he was too shrewd to look up his memory in that way, but he did not mind hiring the land to oblige us. I was not for letting him have it on these terms; but Peter said 'twould make ill-feeling to refuse, and that since Michael meant kindly we ought to accept the offer in the same spirit. So, as you know, Michael took the farm, and we have heard very little about it from that day to this. When he wrote it was always to complain of his bad bargain. But to-day there came a big envelope, which, without saying anything, your father took away with him; and really, Mary, I have a suspicion that there was something in it."

CHAPTER II.

A letter from Michael Gainer was one of those rare incidents likely to bring about a difference between Peter and his wife, as Mary well understood. Although she had known little of her parents' earlier life, of late years her father often talked over with her his simple business affairs; and she was the silent confidante of her mother's views and judgments.

Accordingly, she strongly suspected, that, in putting the communication in his pocket and going off without giving his wife any satisfaction, as the latter said, he wished to put off the discussion of the subject as long as possible. Another reason probably was because he himself wanted first thoroughly to master its contents; for, a man of quick intelligence and sound common sense, self-taught in a wider knowledge than can be obtained from books, Peter yet found reading and writing a heavy task; although mother and daughter would have considered it a breach of filial duty for him to admit as much even to seek other.

Next morning, as Mary fitted about upstairs, to finish small household tasks before setting out for the studio, she heard her father come in from his work.

Presently he called to her, and, running down to the cosy parlor, or "home room," as they named it (there was no room kept expressly sacred to "company" in the unpretentious house), she found him sitting in his own especial easy-chair by the window, with a letter in his hand.

At first glance, one ignorant of the strong affection between them might conclude there could be little to commotion between Peter Gainer and his daughter. If in the long ago he might have been a young fellow pleasant to look upon, because of his sturdiness and strength, he now presented the commonplace appearance of a man of few advantages, who during the best part of his life had worked with his hands.

A striking contrast to his ruggedness and the irregularity of his toiled features was Mary's refinement and her delicate, spiritual face. True the eyes of both were grey, and met one's gaze with a similar frankness and fearlessness; but while Peter's were simply bright and kindly, Mary's were deep and thoughtful.

That the daughter of hard-working Peter and his worthy wife should be so "superior to her surroundings" was often a matter of comment to their friends; yet might it not be readily accounted for by the love and care they had ever lavished upon her? To her Peter's voice was always gentle; while Margaret's motherly solicitude had shielded her from every harsh influence. Then, too, from the time they came to the city they had, by many sacrifices managed to send her to the convent academy near which they lived; "for the Sisters," Margaret affirmed with confidence, "will make her all she should be." Was it to be wondered at, then, that ennobling and refining influences should develop in this girl with a Madonna face something of the loveliness of the Madonna nature?

During this digression, however, Peter had been sitting by the window studying the letter.

"Here, Mary," he said in answer to her morning greeting. "This is from your Uncle Michael, up in Clarion County. Read it, will I see if you make the same sense out of it as I do. I have mislaid my spectacles, and my sight is not as good as it used to be."

"Yes, father. Why should you trouble yourself when there are younger eyes to decipher it for you?" she replied; and, taking the missive, read as follows:

DEAR BROTHER PETER:—This letter leaves me in good health, and I hope will find you and your family in the enjoyment of the same. You have not heard from me in a long time; for I am not much better at the writing than myself, and the crops have never been so scant I have had no money to send you. The land is mighty poor, as you know well; and it is hard enough for me to make ends meet, let alone paying rent. Besides, we have had a deal of sickness during the year. But now, I am happy to say, I have a great piece of luck for you, my dear brother. There's a man come up here lately who may perhaps be brought to take the farm off your hands and mine altogether; and I don't mind owing 'll be glad to get quit of my share in the bargain I made with you, since it has turned out but ill for me.

The land would be of no value at all to this man but that he wants a place to pasture his horses. He buys up worn-out horses for a song, and keeps them out here under sheds all winter. The keen air makes them fractious as colts, and in the spring he takes them to the city and sells them for young horses. He says there is more stone on your land than pasture; but this I will not admit, for I have cleared some of it since you left. Howsoever, I did my best crying it up for you, and at last he has made me an offer.

"Well," says he, "I'll give you fifteen hundred dollars for it."

Think of it, Peter! Five hundred more than you paid for this farm of rock and stubble. But I did better for you still—I brought him up to fifteen hundred.

"Only," says he, "I'll not deal with any outside party. If your brother is the owner of the land, he had best make it over to you, so you can manage the sale for him and give me a clear title. You can send him another paper, promising to pay over to him the money. Thus he will be secure, and may well thank you for doing better for him than he could for himself."

So you see, Peter, it is all fair and square, and above board; for I've had a care we should not be tricked; and sharp as the fellow thinks he is, I'm a bit shrewd myself too, and I know it is a better bargain for us than for him. Fifteen hundred dollars will set you and Margaret and the daughter up wonderfully; and with it you can take your comfort, now you are getting old. Let you might lose the best part of it in fees to those sharks of city lawyers, I have had the deed and the other paper made out here by a competent young attorney, who is well esteemed by all. To save time and make you quite satisfied in your mind, you see, I have already signed the paper, promising to pay you the amount; so if you don't put your name to the deed and send it back to me, you will have me in a bad fix, I won't change you anything for my part in bringing the sale about, save just the sum I have had to pay out, notwithstanding that an agent would ask a commission.

My respects to the wife and daughter. I was glad to learn from your letter there is a chance of Mary's getting married soon. The money will come in handy then. Of course, fond as you are of her, you will want to fit her out well.

For the sake of your own interests, I beg of you to sign the deed, and send it to me by the next mail, for fear the man would change his mind and refuse to take the land, after all.

Your brother and well-wisher, MICHAEL GAINER.
