GOLF.

ON A NEW PRINCIPLE. A little book upon golf, just issued, is attracting considerable attention among devotees of the sport. It is entitled, Golf on a New Principle," and is pub-shed anonymously. Its object is to de-nonstrate that the present clubs in use are entirely inefficient and unscientific The writer declares that the present years, he says, the improvements we have made in our golf clubs have all tended toward one end, which is the oncentration of weight immediately behind the blow. He is thinking, of ourse, of the bulger, and of its graduated tendency to become more and more a simple stick with a round block of wood at the foot of it. If such a tendency, he asks, has been welcomed by all experts, why should we not go one step further, and make our clubs sco that the planes of shaft and the point of impact are one? In other words, he builds a club with a head like a hammer. It is just as though a mall barrel of wood were stuck straight upon the end of the golf stick. For such an invention it is claimed that it makes comparatively an easy pastime that it robs the swing of all fatigue; that it insures greater accuracy, and that older players can play two rounds where hitherto one has tired them out.
