This morning the sunshine was streaming into her room as usual, and there she lay in bed, fast asleep, with that long, bright hair of hers hanging in a thick curly tail over the pillow, and her half-bare arms thrown over her head. Margot sleeps like a child, with her lips just parted, and looks about twelve instead of twentytwo. She has very long eyelashes, which are darker than her bair, and her skin keeps the brilliant rose-andwhite it had when I knew her first as a tiny thing; so that to anyone who loved the girl there would be something particularly sweet about her when she slept. But I don't love her, and I hated her so that my heart began to beat very fast and half choked me. I closed the door as quietly as I had opened it, and went slowly tiptoe-

ing downstairs. I was glad that she was asleep instead of talking to Noel, but his early visit was more puzzling than ever. If a large screen made according to his he had sent up word to Margot she would have received it before this, for he must now have been in the house a quarter of an hour. Whatever I meant to do-and I wasn't quite cer-Margot's room to wake her. Margot gets up earlier than I do, for she algoes down to breakfast with Uncle Gordon at a quarter to ten, while I, being delicate, usually take mine in my room after my bath.

As I've just said, I hadn't entirely made up my mind what to do; but somehow I was determined to find out why Noel Brent was in the house-a from me (if it really were a secret, as I vaguely suspected) unless I were clever enough to discover it for my-

I was picking my way downstairs so elp it, or by Uncle Gordon, in case were receiving Noel. I didn't even know where the visitor might be: whether in one of the drawing-rooms, or Margot's boudoir, or Uncle Gordon's study, or the library; or whether he and my uncle were having an early breakfast together in the dining-room. But just as I had reached the turn of the stairs and the landing where the grandfather's clock stands, the electric door bell rang, and one of the footmen went quickly across the hall. I could see without being seen if I flattened myself against the wall, and

Henry let in Lord Reckworth, the for Foreign Affairs. He was promply escorted to the door of Uncle Gordon's study; and so I had received the hint I had been wanting, for I could not doubt there was some connection between the two extraordinary early visits, and that Noel was already in the same room, probably closeted with my uncle. "What can it all mean?" I said to myself, as-when Henry was out of Mr. Brent?" inquired the Foreign Secsight-I went on down the stairs.

Noel Brent had nothing whatever to onew that he had Parliamentary amfilled shortly, as he was clever, and had some influence, though not much money. Meanwhile, however, he was only a fine-looking young man of 29 or pected by those who are watching this 30-to me the best looking on earthof good birth and education, who had made a name, and became something said Lord Reckworth. "Partly that able book he had written about an already on friendly terms with our equally remarkable climbing exploit in the Himalayas. Why should he be called into private consultation with the Home Secretary and the Foreign Secretary between 8 and 9 in the morning?—or was the meeting between the two elderly men and the young one to be friendly and unofficial?

Perhaps my hopeless love for him and my gnawing jealousy of Margot had made me morbid; but I could not banish the conviction that somehow the mysterious affair was connected with Noel's wish to marry my cousin; and suddenly an exciting idea darted into my brain. What if, having asked Uncle Gordon's consent to the engage- that Margot's father should be instrument, he was now being arraigned before an informal court of justice for ome flagrant misdeed in the past, before our knowledge of him began? Now, if I stood behind the book-screen there was not a corner of the room from which I could be detected. Of course, if anyone else came in I might be seen by that person, unless I had time to dart behind the door as it opened, concealing myself from a superficial glance in the folds of a heavy embroidered velvet portiere secret which would very likely be kept which was habitually drawn back. # POLICE HAVE IMPORTANT CLUES

The Dead Man Was Heavily Insured, One of the Policies Being in His Wife's Favor.

Buffalo, N. Y., March 4. - The most important piece of news which has been developed regarding the murder of E. L. Burdick since the announcement of the crime itself, came to light yesterday afternoon. It is this: Indisputable evidence shows that Burdick was lying on the couch in his den when the attack which ended his 'life was made. There was no struggle worthy of the name of struggle, the unfortunate man succumbing almost immediately to the first blows struck. The assailant was a woman.
