TELLS GRAPHIC LIFE STORY OF LLOYD GEORGE

Rev. George Adam, Montreal, Addresses Audience in First Congregational Church

LOVES COUNTRY FIRST

His Native Land and People Dear to Heart of the British Premier.

On the eve of the Washington disarmament conference, at which David Lloyd George will undoubtedly play a skipper's part in guiding the battered ship of humanity into more sheltered waters, and at the time when the interest of Britain is testing the true greatness of the British premier, what could be more fitting than the history and a word-picture of the little Welshman? Such a lecture was given in the First Congregational Church of this city Thursday night by Rev. George Adam of the Emmanuel Church of Montreal. It was a vivid sketch of the life and accomplishments of Lloyd George that drew the attention of hundreds of intensely interested auditors. This address covered, in proper sequence, the events in three score years of a picturesque career, several decades of which were marked by heavy English history.

But always it was made humanly appealing by touches of pathos, of which the speaker seemed always a master, and by flashes of wit and humor which would tax the genius of a Bill Nye to properly report.

Father Was School Teacher. Turning back the pages of biography, Mr. Adam gave his audience a peep of a sick little babe restless in the throes of a high fever, at whose side a mother anxiously watched, and a doctor fought desperately with the spectre of death. Outside the squat, dingy red brick tenement house the wind swept gusts of rain down a mean street of Manchester. It was the first introduction to the man and his birthplace.

Little David's father was a school teacher, and poorly paid at that, and Mrs. George was left with two little boys and a little girl in her care, and little money. The next day after the funeral the landlord, accompanied by an auctioneer, arrived, and that night the widow found herself with only the sky as a covering.

She had previously written to a brother, Richard Lloyd, living at Llany-standwy, a village in the north of Wales, telling of her impending plight, and before the night had grown very old the long form of the Welsh cobbler hove out of the twilight. He took them to his humble cobbler-shop and home, where he had lived long alone.

Fondness for Discussion. Rev. Mr. Adam's description of the boyhood of Lloyd George would fit the youth of almost any real boy. The youth did have, however, a peculiar fondness to go to the blacksmith shop of the village, where the men of the town met to discuss and settle great national problems. The youngster often irritated the sages of the village by telling them that they were wrong, and by endeavoring to set them right.

It was first decided that the boy should be made a school teacher, but it was found impossible when little David refused to join the church, expressing a decided preference for the Campbellites. Eventually, on the advice of the village smithy, the boy was sent to study law. Failing to find any one in the village who would or could teach the boy the necessary Latin, the uncle, now well beyond middle age, studied the language at the end of long days of work, and in turn taught the boy.

The first two cases of the premier-to-be gave unmistakable evidence of the young attorney's sharp wit and dogged determination. The second case, involving the question of burial, led the young lawyer to the House of Lords, where he successfully fought for his clients on the floor.

Offered Candidacy. It was soon after this that Lloyd George was offered the Liberal candidacy for his home riding, which he accepted.

It was at this time also that he thought of marriage, bestowing his love on Margaret Owen, a beautiful farmer's daughter, near the village. In relating the story of the courtship Mr. Adam rose to the height of his humorous descriptive work.

David Lloyd George carried the election, defeating the Conservative candidate, who had represented the riding for 23 years, by 40 votes.

In rather a ludicrous attire of checkered trousers and a long-tailed morning coat, which would not meet in the front, the new member of Parliament arrived in London. On his first attempt to enter the House he was directed by the police on guard to the messengers' entrance, but he finally became properly established.

Almost immediately he picked on Joseph Chamberlain as the only member of the Government who was worthy of his steel, and although it took years of persistent work, permeated by many failures, he emerged triumphant from the contest with the proud English statesman.

Made Influence Felt. Eventually he was given a seat in Asquith's cabinet, as president of the board of trade, a body which had not functioned in more than a century. But the young statesman immediately perturbed the businessmen of the country by becoming the whole board himself, and by making his influence felt. Always he kept the spectre of the poor in front of him, and he sought measures continually to ameliorate their sufferings. To do this he sought to take money from those who had it.

He was given the chancellorship of the exchequer, and he immediately introduced new systems of taxation and financing. To his credit were such bills as the old age pensions act, mothers' pensions, national insurance, and land taxation.

Then, as a bolt from the blue into all his wonderful plans, came the war. The story of his wonderful work during the war years, first in consolidating the finances of the country, then in the roles of minister of munitions, minister of war, and finally as the premier, the speaker told with much power and detail.

To Lloyd George he gave the credit of forging the arms of steel which finally crushed the enemy.

Will Solve Problems. He touched briefly on the great problems which still confront the premier, but he expressed confidence that he would emerge splendidly triumphant.

Describing Lloyd George personally, Mr. Adam said:

"He is a little fellow, with legs that are by no means straight. His personality is the really great thing; in fact, it is spellbinding. His voice is soft and never strident, even his most forceful and radical utterances are delivered in an almost purring and modulated voice.

"When speaking he usually stands resting with his legs crossed, and he invariably plays with his watch-chain, often using the glasses with which to point. His gestures are few. He is often interrupted during speeches, but his repartee is always equal to the occasion.

"He is a man that loves his country and people above all things," said Rev. Mr. Adam.

BANS DANCING ON CHURCH PROPERTY

Methodist District Conference Passes Resolution To This Effect.

Members of the London District Methodist Conference, in session all day on Thursday in the Wellington Street Church, placed a ban on card-playing and dancing on Methodist Church property, by unanimously passing a resolution to this effect.

The conference put itself on record in expressing belief that as the church property was to be used in the best interests of the community in which it was situated, and placing the stamp of approval on churches and schools being used to promote all activities aiming at the welfare of the community, but arguing that these two amusements would tend to degenerate the church rather than to advance it.

Not Teaching Dancing. Mrs. Henderson, representing the Y. W. C. A., handed down a report that the institution was teaching dancing as absolutely untrue. True, she said, the physical department was teaching calisthenics and folk games in order to win young girls away from the dance halls.

It was decided to set aside those Sundays falling on Nov. 27 and Dec. 4 for presentation in all the charges of the work of missions, and Sunday, Dec. 15, for educational work.

C. E. German, outlining the responsibility of Sunday school superintendents in the matter of evangelism, defined "evangelism" as "the turning of man from sin to faith and loyalty to Jesus Christ." Eighty per cent of the church members came from the Sunday school, he stated, and the superintendent was largely responsible for evangelism in the school. He himself must be a Christian. He must order the school so that the spirit of reverence will pervade it. By personal contact he must put himself in a position of influence among the scholars.

Life Blood of Church. Rev. John Garbutt, speaking of the responsibility of the quarterly board in regard to evangelism, declared that the quarterly board of the Methodist Church was the very heart through which the life-blood of the church flowed, the very life of the church evangel. Methodism, he said, believes God in Christ is reconciling a world of estranged men unto himself.

John Elliott, B.A., in course of an address on "The Pastor His Own Evangelist," said that the business of the pastor is the basilest of leadership. He was to lead the congregation along lines of evangelistic effort. He urged every circuit to put evangelism to the fore, and to make special efforts during the winter months.

The next meeting of the conference will be held in February next.

Rev. John Agnew presided.

Entire Exhibit of One of Canada's Leading Upholstering Firms On Sale

We have purchased, at a great big discount, the entire factory exhibit of a splendid manufacturer, and now announce that the entire display will be disposed of at prices that for lowness are fairly amazing. You're going to find here suites that you have never dreamed would ever be within the reach of your expenditure, but which are now priced as low as inferior ones were.

Some idea of these prices may be gained when we tell you that even our salesmen were amazed when they read the price tickets attached to them. And these men have seen many price reductions on furniture that were considered sensational, but which failed to move them.

We know an unusual demand will follow this announcement of these values. We know that our patrons and friends realize that our printed statements are never exaggerated, and that our merchandise always backs up every assertion we make. Column after column of newspaper space could be devoted to the description of these suites, but in justice to the merchandise, we ask that you come in and actually see for yourself what truly wonderful suites and chairs these are. And the earlier you come the better will be your choice.
