

LONDON.

The annual rifle matches of the 7th Fusiliers were fired at the Cove range, London, on 10th inst. and were most successful in every particular. They were conducted on sound military principles, for the Battalion turned out (about eighty strong) and paraded from the Drill Shed to the range at 8 a. m., headed by the bugle band; from the time of their arrival until the target began to grow dim in the dusk of approaching night, the pleasant valley of the Coves rang out with rifle reports. The snow did not serve to dampen the enthusiasm of the men, and altogether created but slight discomfort. Blazing camp fires, plenty of refreshments and the keen competition among the officers and men individually and the companies had a great deal to do with the pleasures of the day. The western winds interfered to some extent with the scoring.
