

Parole With Gradual and Parole In Principle.

Two types of discretionary parole are closely related to temporary parole.

“Parole with Gradual” is, in effect, discretionary parole preceded by temporary parole. This may occur because of the length of time the inmate has been confined. It is a method by which parole authorities attempt to ease the inmate’s transition from confinement to community. It is assumed that discretionary parole is imminent. The date on which release is effected is determined by field officers of the Parole Service.

“Parole in Principle” is given when the inmate is granted discretionary parole subject to certain conditions, such as housing or employment arrangements. One of the conditions may be a probationary period of temporary parole. In such a case, discretionary parole will follow only if the period of temporary parole is successfully completed.

References

¹Committee Proceedings. June 22, 1972.
Brief Nos. 20, 52, 74.

²National Parole Board. Statistics 1971 . . .

³National Parole Board. Statistics 1971 . . .

⁴National Parole Board. Statistics 1971 . . .

⁵Canadian Penitentiary Service. Commissioner’s Directive No. 228 . . . pp. 4-6.