MOONDYNE.

THE GOLD MINE OF THE VASSE.

The chain-gang works outside the prison walls of Fremantie, in the granite quarries. The neighborhood, being thickly settled with pardoned men and ticketofleave men, had long been deserted by the aborigines; but from the day of Moondyne's sentence the bushmen began to build their myers and hold their correlators are near the quarries.

their corrobborees near the quarries.

For two years the chain-gang toiled among the stones, and the black men sat on the great unhewn rocks, and never seemed to tire of the scene. The warders took no notice of their silent presence. The natives never spoke to a prisoner, but sat there in dumb interest, every day in the year, one day they disappeared from the quarries, and an officer who passed through their village of myers, found them deserted. It was quite a subject warders. Where had they gone to? Why had they deserted in the night? The day following, an answer came to these queries. When the chain-gang was formed, to return to the prison, one link was gone—Moondyne was missing. His irons were found, filed through, sehind the rock at which he worked;

and from that day the black face of an was never seen in Fremantle.

THE KOAGULUP SWAMP. We arrive now at the opening scene of this story. Eight days after his escape from Remantle, Mondyne was seen by the convict Dave Terrell, on the shores of the Koagulup Swamp. In those eight days he had travelled two hundred miles, suffering that which is only known to the hunted convict. When he met the prisoner in the moonlight and made the motion to silence, Dave Terrell saw the long barrel of a pistol in his belt. He meant to sell his life this time, for there was no hope if retaken.

His intention was to hide in the swamp till he found an opportunity of striking in the Vasse Mountains, a spur of which was not more than sixty miles perflors; and swift as had been Moon-dyne's flight, the shadow of the pursuer was close behind. No tardy step was that of him who led the pursuit-a man with a terribly maimed face—a new officer of the penal system, but whose motive in the pursuit was deadlier and dearer than the love of public duty.

On the very day that Moondyne Joe On the very day that Moondyne Joe-reached the great swamp, the mounted pursuit tracked the fugitive to the water's edge. A few hours later, while he lay exhausted on an island in the densely-wooded morase, the long sedge was cautiously divided a few yards from his face, and the glittering eyes of a native tracker met his for an instant. Before he could spring to his feet the supple savage was upon him, sending out his bush-cry as he sprang. A short struggle with the black hands on the white throat; then the great white arms 'closed around the black body, and with a gasping sob it lost its nerve and lay still, while Moondyne half rose, to listen. trackers closing on him. He sank back with a mean of despair. But the next instant the blood maked from his heart with a new vigor for every muscle. It was the last breath of his fre and he would fight for it as for his life. He sprang to his feet and met his first brutal assailant, a native dog,—half wolf, half greyhound,—which sprang at his throat, but sank its fangs in his

A bullet through the animal's brain left him the again, with steadied nerves. Even in the decidence of the moment is trill of gratitude that it was not a man that lay there passed through him. He mung his pistol into the swamp, and dashed toward the log on which he had asked toward the log on which he had gained the island. Beside it stood two gained the island. Beside it stood two man armond. Barchanded, the fugitive flung himself upon them, and closed it desperate struggle. It was vain, how ever; others came and struck him down and overpowered him.

He was put in irons, and found himself in charge of the most brutal officer in the penal service,— his old fellow convict and employer, Isaac Bowman. VI.

THE BRIBE. When the party had travelled a dozen miles from the convict camp, the evening closed, and the sergeant called a halt. A chain was passed round a tree, and locked; and to this the menacles of the prisoner were made fast, leaving him barely the power of lying down. With a common prisoner this would have been security enough; but the sergeant meant to leave no loophole open. He and the private trooper would keep guard all highly; and sepording to this order, after supper, the trooper entered on the first four hours' watch.

The natives and wounded men took their meal and were stretched on the
