veranda—the ashes flicked from a fat cigar, and thick-weather signals-a fit of coughing. . . I felt the cling of her fingers. Very orderly we passed her fingers. Very orderly we passed under the light together.

The proprietor remarked urbanely that it was a fine night, to which I agreed, with un-English fervor. And up we have the proprietor the man with a lamp went together—the man with a lamp.

My whole nature was fired with protests against this thrusting, dividing hand of the world—that summarily chucked us off to bed. True she was not far distant-at the end of the hall, a room or two away, at most, -but it was a terrible fall from the glory and solitude of the night-world, to these walls and oil-lamps, our parting for the night, manhandled.

I stood at the door while the proprietor made my room ready; and as he emerged, turning attentively for any last wish, I remembered a very good cigar that I had seen in his case downstairs. Mentioning this, his reply was to lead the way below. . . I bade him to lead the way below. . . I bade him good-night with the case between us. The upper hall was deserted. My door had been left open so there could be no mistake. I glanced to the farther door in which Mary Romany had vanishing ed; and in the next instant an astonishing fact abrased my brain. The distance between her room and mine was that of but one good-sized room, rather than two; and what I had supposed was a hall door between area only a protect. hall-door between was only a pretext, designed to keep up the slavish uniformity of a hotel-hall. The wall was not broken the sash and panels were but rudimentary

Consequently whatever filled in the distance between Mary Romany's room and mine was certainly not a guestchamber, since there was no hall opening.

I entered my room, locked it, and regarded the other door which I had taken or a clothes-closet—in the eminent direction. It was provided with a bolt, which was not shot.

It did not occur to me that Mary Romany's room could extend the entire distance to this wall. I must see what was beyond this inner door, but before I tried it, the zest of the whole matter was whiffed away by the thought that the door was of course locked on the other side. This became so probable in the next few seconds, that it hardly seemed worth while to try; but I did.

The door opened easily with a turn of the hand. The intervening room, now used for storage, was unmistakably the middle apartment of a family-suite in the hotel season. Just at this instant Mary Romany opened her door in my direction—and we faced each other with the world shut out.

Never were the eyes of Mary Romany so wide, as her arms lifted involuntarily and stretched out to me. The glory and sweetness of her riveted me for an instant; and in this interval, a spark seemed to cross the divine darkness of her eyes; her lips quivered; her head bowed and she turned away from the open door.

She was standing by the far window, her back to me. It had been like dragging through an interminable night-mare, as I sped across the store-room—and to her, at the window.

From the holy night, and its hours of eavenly concord, back to this world; from the sudden unspeakable happiness of the discovery, and her uplifted arms the proprieties of a hotel-room;—the test was tumultuous. It was not that I believed her afraid, but in the mere thought that she could be sorry this had happened, there was a destructive princi-

Could she be sorry, when every impulse of mine was to be glad? In the horror of this structural rift I stood there beside her—not lifting my hand.

Her face turned slowly to the lamplight. I saw her sparkling teeth, her eyelids dropped as if in a tension of expectancy. . . Then she beheld my face.

"Oh—" and her arms lifted again "Ryerson Boy—your face is like death—"
"I thought—forgive me—I thought you were sorry—"

"Sorry,—when I came to Long Island to be with you?—though one could not have thought of this—"

"When you turned away—"
"I was startled. It was not you,
but I thought of —this—this man,

The Steel Truss BARN

With its fireproof walls and roof and strong steel trusses will give you substantial, neat and cheap housing for your crops and animals.

Read what a brother farmer says:

Alvinston, Ont.

Dear Sirs,—I am well pleased with my barn, and want to say in connection with the building of the barn that one can get a barn so much quicker by taking your style than the old-fashioned wooden barn, and also the expense in the building, boarding men, etc., is greatly reduced. I would judge not more than one-quarter the cost it would be for a wooden barn. These two items alone should induce anyone to build your style of barn. Now, in connection with the barn itself, I consider that it is lightning-proof, and the danger from fire is not so great should other buildings be burned close by. It never needs painting, and I think it a very much stronger barn than any timber frame I ever saw. I think it will last much longer than a wooden barn, and its general appearance should recommend it to anyone who is going to build.

Yours very truly,

W. J. BOURNE.

This man saved money by putting up a Steel Truss Barn. We can save money for you, too. We are putting up 50%more barns this year than last, and as we purchased most of our materials before prices advanced, can give you special value. Send us size of your barn and say when you will be ready to build, and we will send you a copy of our large new book, The Steel Truss Barn, which tells all about the barn and gives a few good stable plans, etc.
