An Indispensible Favorite OR Wealth and Beauty at Stake!

CHAPTER V.

"Why, mother, do you wish me to "canvass for Lyulph?" Dallas asks, very coldly.

He never calls her "mother" except when displeased with her or very dislikes it so.

"Because it would be so much better for us both—you know it would," Lady Nora replies, agitatedly—"If we could keep on a friendly footing with the Pentreath people, I have no chance," Lady Nora says, flushing angrily and biting her lip, "between that horrid Glynne and that poor miserable Lady Maria. I simply can't endure to stay in the room with her and her awful aches and pains and silliments, and her wretched little dying babies. And Glynne tyrannizes ever more insolently, and misrepresents me to his father. Pentreath was quite amiable and good-natured to me, always until his son set me against him."

"Tyrannizes over you?" Dallas echoes, questioningly.

"Yes—about debts and—and all sorts of things," Lady Nora answers, happily—"reads me lectures, and advises me, and tries to spy into everything I do or say."

"Do you owe him money, mother?"
Dallas asks.

"Of course I owe him money!" Lady Nora answers sharply, impatient at the absurdity of the question, "I asked him to help me when I was in difficulties about that house in Seymour Street. Whom ought he to have helped if he didn't help his uncle's widow, left destitute as I was too?
Of course, he thinks a great deal of his money," she adds, contemptuously. "He is richer than ever he was since he went in for those city speculations, and meaner, if possible!"

If you are below the mark—

Take BOVRIL

"He is mean and hypocritical, and he is a man for whom I have neither liking nor respect; and I am not going to toady Lyulph Glynne for the sake of trying to get into a corner of my uncle's good graces," Dallas declares. "Lord Pentreath sees people only through his son's eyes."

"You don't toady him," Lady Nora says, eagerly. "You need only let Pentreath see you, Dallas, for him to like you." There are real maternal love and pride in her glance as she speaks. "He hasn't seen you for years—since you were a mere schoolboy. You are sure to be popular with every one of their set—and they are a good set, though pompous and dull, as you say," she continues, more eagerly. "And, if you do canvass for Lyulph, and he is successful, he cannot but feel under a deep obligation to you; and his father, too, will feel the obligation. Dallas, dear, it is a chance—you must not neglect it!" she urges.

"I thought you used not to care whether the Pentreaths were friends with us or not?" remarks Dallas, coldly. "And only yesterday I understood we were both to seek 'fresh woods and pastures new' in the shape of these people you picked up at the hotel."

"The dryer alter people?" questions Lady Nora, coolly.

"Yes—quite right. I do not mean to drop them on any account. I am sure they are worthy, useful people to know."

"But that is no reason why you should devote yourself to them, Dallas," Lady Nora says, decisively. "I will watch your interests there, if it need be. The girl is a sentimental, impressionable little thing, I fancy, and you could very easily renege yourself at any time in the place in her estimation which I have no doubt you hold at present;" and Lady Nora smiles an ugly, cunning little smile.

"I have found out from the old uncle that the money—this girl, Yolande's money, at all events—is strictly settled on herself—her own sole and separate use and all that sort of thing, he gave me very plainly to understand; and it is carefully invested, and in the trusteeship of himself and her aunt and a whole posse of relatives—centina or something of that kind—jam and pickle makers."

"What?" Dallas asks.
"Jam and pickle makers," Lady Nora repeats, airily—"sardine importers and so forth, you know—people called Barjant, or Wilmet, or some such name."

"Oh, ay—I heard her speak of coun-in Wilmet!" Dallas says, with a slight sardonic smile. "I thought there were 'sweet' associations with the name."
"So, in that case, you know, with any of their vulgar trustees set over you, and any hampering restrictions, and without proper settlements, you could not think of the girl," Lady Nora declares, decisively. "She is not very presentable either—a mere raw schoolgirl. I told the old uncle plainly that to fit Yolande to appear in good society she would need at least a thousand pounds to be spent upon her. He looked thunderstruck," her ladyship adds, laughing, "and asked me 'What for?' And I replied quietly, 'To polish her in mind, manners, and appearance; to teach her fashionable accomplishments, and give her the tone of thoroughly well-bred people—a work of time in itself.' One has to put one's foot down on the prejudices and ideas of that class of people," continues Lady Nora, daintily pushing aside the dead leaves with her parasol as she walked along.

Dallas laughs. It does not matter to him in the very least, and his mother's hard, shrewd, selfish wordliness affords him cynical amusement.
By and by tea is ready, and Dallas carries a cup to Yolande, and fetches one for himself, and sinks down on the grass at her feet, to drink it and talk to her.

It is with an acknowledged feeling which he would be ashamed to put into words—as of giving her a little more of the society she evidently prizes—that he does so; and he sees the expected result instantly. The quiet, pensive face and clouded, wistful eyes brighten and glow as if with the light of a mystic hidden fire, the blood ebbs and flows in delicate transient flushes beneath the clear, pale skin, as he talks to her and looks up into her face as no man has ever looked at her before—with a calm, masterful regard. And the woman's awaking soul owns his sway and admits him now and forever as lord and master.

The evening air is cool, the golden light of the setting sun is making long, deep shadows the wind is whispering among the oaks on the river banks, as Dallas and Yolande walk back to the waiting carriages.

"This has been a very pleasant afternoon, has it not?" he says, in his tenderest manner.
"Yes—very," she replies, timidly.
"You might give me a bit of that mint blossom as a souvenir! Will you?" he asks, entreatingly. "Have you the bit I gave you? Yes, I see you have. Are you constant, then, to anything or person you like?"

"I hope so," Yolande answers, her voice husky with nervousness, her face flushing hotly with shame and happiness, as she stoops and gathers a blossom of the mint for him.

"Thank you, Yolande," he says, gently, and presses the hand that tenders him the flower, which he puts away in his pocketbook and forgets, until he tumbles it out one day and thinks how horribly suggestive of peppermint lozenges the perfume is, and so tosses it into the fire.

But the happy hours extend into the happy night for Yolande. They have a dance and a supper at the hotel when they return, and, when it is near midnight and Dallas is feeling sleepy and inclined to yawn, he resolves to bid his little partner who waltzes so very badly good-night and good-by, and tell her that he is going back to England the next morning with his cousin, Viscount Glynne, and that in all probability they shall not meet again.

"Poor little girl, I dare say she will be disappointed!" he says, rather pityingly to himself for Countess Glynne is good-natured, and would rather draw a smile than a sigh, especially from a woman.

A printed silk blouse is worn with a silk skirt, matching in color the groundwork of the design.

A beautiful dance frock of pink ta-feta is adorned with coarses of Val-lées edged with silver.

Heavy rich embroidery in green and gold is used on a frock of almond green and black silk crepe.

Dependable

One of the finest tributes to the quality and reliability of Purity Milk is the regularity with which it is used on craft of all kinds.

It fills every milk need that calls for milk and sugar. You will find it wonderfully satisfactory and econ-

"Wet" Ship Problem.

BRITAIN WILL NOT AGREE TO 12-MILE LIMIT.

In a very temperate tone the question of liquor and liners was debated in the House of Lords recently (writes a Parliamentary correspondent).

Lord Birkenhead dwelt upon the damage which would be inflicted on the Mercantile Marine by a continuance of the present situation, and he reminded the House that it was not merely a question of liners, but of the whole British shipping industry engaged in the Atlantic trade. He has been studying the judgment of the Supreme Court, and he drew attention to one significant sentence. The court was at pains to point out that the Volstead Act, as finally interpreted by the court, need not be enforced in regard to neutral shipping if the Executive deemed enforcement inexpedient. It was a plain hint to the Executive which has not been taken.

Lord Curzon indicated very plainly that he considered recent incidents in New York were due to a desire to persuade this country to acquiesce in a twelve-mile limit.

The American Note is now being considered by a committee under Mr. Ronald McNeill, and the outcome of its deliberations is not yet known.
But Lord Curzon said bluntly that there was no chance of our agreeing to the twelve-mile limit.

Exasperation on Both Sides.

Lord Grey agreed that there was cause for exasperation on both sides, and it seemed that he would not be averse from a modification of the limit, for the waiving of a doctrine for specific purposes might in effect be a reaffirmation of the doctrine; but there was a danger that in extending the three-mile limit in order to stop British ships from landing cargoes of spirits a trade which is not illegal in itself might simply pass into the hands of other countries, and there would, therefore, have to be some general agreement if the limit is to be altered.

The Latest Phase.

A New York telegram says: Smarting from the taunts of the "Wets" and "Drys" Prohibition officials called upon the Secretary of State in the middle of the week, and while the conference is described as private and no official communiqué is issued, it is known that an application was made demanding the confiscation in future of ships violating the Volstead Law.

Mr. Hughes expressed the opinion that no foreign country would attempt to challenge American authority to enforce the dry law, even to the seizure of ships, pending the settlement by Congress of a situation possibly involving international complications.

Fashions and Fads.

New girdles are apt to take a slanting line.

The tiered-back frock is enormously popular.

Pipings of red are charming on beige-colored sandals.

The popular linen sports frock is embroidered all over.

A smart cloche of green felt has a Tam-o'-Shanter crown.

The latest slippers from Paris have rather square toes.

Silver footgear completes a dinner gown of black moire.

Just Folks.

By EDGAR A. GUEST.

THE SQUANDERERS.
Plenty makes squanderers of us all on earth.
Where there is much men fling their loves away.
To-morrow may be cold and drear and gray.
But now we can be lavish with our mirth.
Why count the treasure or regard its worth?
Why try to shield the forests from decay?
These trees will long outlive our little day.
And see new generations come to birth.
Yet even mines and forests disappear And desolation stands where plenty reigned; What once was squandered now is valued dear.
Much would we give for what we once despised.
Wise is the man who sees beyond his day.
And knows that plenty comes but cannot stay.

A PRACTICAL APRON STYLE.

4408. The apron affords good protection to the busy housekeeper. It is easy to develop and to launder. It slips over the head, but may be made adjustable at the skirt portion.
Dotted percale in white and blue, with binding of blue sateen is here shown.
This is a good model for cretonne or gingham.

The pattern is cut in 4 sizes:
Small, Medium, Large and Extra Large. A medium size requires 3½ yards of 27 inch material.
Pattern mailed to any address on receipt of 10c. in silver or stamps.

A POPULAR MODEL.

4404. The house dress of to-day has many versions. It is now one of the most attractive garments in the busy woman's wardrobe. The style here shown has long waist portions over which trimming panels are arranged. The short-sleeve and low collar, make this a comfortable model.

The pattern is cut in 7 sizes: 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. A 35 inch size requires 4½ yards of 32 inch material. The width at the foot is 3½ yards.

receipt of 10c. in silver or stamps.
