A rapid walk of a few minutes brought him to a house which presented a dark front to the street, with the exception of an upper window, and from that, a light streamed bright enough to compensate for the darkness of its neighbors. 'In time if ejaculated Paul; and in a short time he stood in that very upper room before his friend.

'Why, Paul, was Harvey's greeting as he looked up from the book and paper, pens and ink before him. 'How very quietly you came in. You would make a very respectable ghost, if your clothes were white. An Indian might envy the softness of your tread.'

'Nonsense, Henry. I stepped as heavily, and made as much noise as usual; but you were so buried in books that your ears were oblivious to all outside sounds. But since I have drawn you from the enchanting realms of imagination, I should like to claim your attention for a short time.'

'All attention,' returned his friend, 'if you will kindly allow me to return to those realms of which you spoke for a few minutes, and finish some work which requires me just now.'

He turned again to his writing, and Paul having nothing else to do, watched the rapid movement of his pen, as it glided over the white paper leaving its words behind it. Page after page was turned, and still the pen kept up its steady scratch to the surprise of Paul, who wondered why Harvey never had to stop as he did and puzzle his brains over something new. At last the writing was finished, and the young man after wiping his pen carefully, declared himself at his friend's service.

'I scarcely know what I want; said Paul, 'nor how you can help me, but the fact is I am tired of my hum-drum life, and I go to get along faster.'

'A very clearly expressed sentence,' returned Harvey, 'and I suppose I must find out your meaning the best way I can. In the first place, what do you want to get along so rapidly with?'

'My work of course,' growled Paul; for he was suspicious that his friend was having some fun at his expense.

'I see now,' was the reply. 'You want an enchanted pen.'

'Why can't you stop chaffing a fellow, and talk sensibly?' said Paul angrily. 'I did not come here to hear nonsense.'

'Well listen to sense then. You ought to have an enchanted pen.'

Paul started to his feet, and was moving toward the door, when Harvey laid his hand on his shoulder, saying—

'I don't wonder at your being angry, old chum; but I am really in earnest. Sit down, I have something to tell you.

'I do not wonder that you are dissatisfied with your progress, for it is certainly up-hill work. I have felt just as you do, and therefore will the more gladly help you.'

'One afternoon about two years ago, I was sitting in my study, racking my brains over an article which I could not get to suit me. The day was sultry and I was tired. My brain seemed empty, and giv'ing up in despair I resigned myself to the influence of the hours, leaned my head on the table before me, and fell into a reverie. My thoughts were not of the most pleasing nature and prominent among them was the question, which I dare say you have often put to yourself. 'Why am I not more popular? I knew the cause must be in myself, yet what it I knew not, nor the remedy. It is of no use I said, at last, half aloud. I shall be a drudge all my life, and may as well cease striving with fate. Just then I felt a hand touch my shoulder. I looked up, and beheld one of the most radiant beings that human eyes ever looked upon. In one hand she held a crown of laurels, while in the other I saw a pen, which glittered and shone like a diamond. I looked at it intently for a time, but at last my eyes turned to the crown, and gazed upon it eagerly.

My visitor saw my earnest, covetous look and said:—

'Wouldst thou have this crown?'

'Yes, please give it me, I said, reaching out my hand.

With a smile which softened the sharpness of my disappointment, he held it high, and said:—

'Thou canst have both, but not now. First find the pen, it may cost thee a long search, but persevere, and then thou shalt have the crown.'

'Where is it? I asked, hoping that I could learn something more; but she had disappeared, with both crown and pen, and I was again alone.

For a time I was bewildered, and sat like one in a dream; but at last I aroused myself, and began to think calmly on what I had seen and heard. If I found the pen I should have the crown, my strange visitor had said; and then I must search for it with not the slightest idea where, for it was not likely that such a pen as the one I had seen was common. You may imagine my head was full of pens and crowns, and when I slept that night, they danced around me in wild confusion. After a while, however, they subsided, and I dreamed that the pen, I so much coveted, was in the library of a certain literary old gentleman who had recently died, and concerning whose well filled book-shelves there had been various rumours. I was not very well pleased with the idea of seeking leave of the old gentleman's widow, to Poetry.

The following lines from the New England Diadem were suggested upon hearing read an extract from a letter written by Capt. Chase, brother-in-law of Mr. Brown Owen, who died on his passage to California some years ago.

Lay up nearer, brother, nearer,
For my limbs are growing cold,
And thy presence seemeth dearer,
Now that I am dying.

I am dying, brother, dying,
Soon 'er'll miss me in your berth,
For my form will soon be lying,
'Neath the ocean's briny surf.

Hearken to me, brother, hearken,
I have something I would say,
Ere the veil my vision darkens,
And I go from hence away.

I am going, surely going,
But my hope is not in vain,
I am willing, brother, knowing
That he doeth nothing wrong.

Tell my father when you greet him,
That in death I pray'd for him,
Prayed that I may one day meet him,
In a world that's free from sin.

Tell my mother, (God assist her),
Now that she is growing old,
That her child would gladly kiss her,
When his lips grew pale and cold.

Listen, brother, catch each whisper,
"Tis my wish to tell you,
Tell her, brother, closely listen,
When the fever burned my brow;

Don't forget a single word,
That in death my eyes did gladden,
With the tears her memory stirred.

Tell her she must kiss my children,
Like the kiss I last impressed,
Hold them as when I last held them,
Closely folded to my breast;

Give them early to their Maker,
Putting all her trust in God,
For he never will forsake her,
For he's said so in his word.

O my children! Heaven bless them?
They were all my life to me,
Would I could once more caress them,
Ere I sink beneath the sea.

'Twas for them I crossed the ocean,
Hazard's butter they'd not tell,
But I've gained an orphan's position,
Yet he doeth all things well.

Tell my sisters I remember
Every kindly parting word,
And my heart has been kept tender
By the thoughts their memory stored.

Tell them I'm reaching the haven,
Where I sought the "precious dust,"
But have gained a port called heaven,
Where the gold will never rust.

Uge them to secure an entrance,
For they'll find their brother there;
Faith in Jesus, and repentance
Will secure for each a share—

Hark I hear my Saviour speaking,
'Tis I know his voice so well,
When I am gone, oh don't be weeping,
Brother, here's my last farewell.

THE ENCHANTED PEN.
[Original.]
BY ANNIE PATSON.

'There!' exclaimed Paul Montague, closing the book before him with a bang, and leaning back in his chair. 'Enough of study to-night. How very cold it is; and here too,' he added, glancing at the clock. 'I did not think I had been reading so long.'

He stirred the fire, and wheeled his chair round to sit down to make, and lay plans for the future. He had chosen his profession, and enjoyed a fair amount of success and popularity; but not enough to satisfy the onward march of his ambition. The slow progress his name made in working its upward way, through the host of others, sorely tried his patience, and zeal; especially when he occasionally read of the brilliant success of some other. 'Surely,' thought he, 'there must be some shorter, easier road to fame than the one on which I am plodding so slowly. But where is it? And how found?' He settled back more comfortably in his chair, and began to study out the questions; but the farther he went, the more his difficulties increased, and starting up he donned overcoat and hat, and sallied forth to try the effect of the cool night air on his heated brain, and fumbled thoughts.

He walked aimlessly awhile, and then gave a sudden turn, saying:—

'Why didn't I think of it before? I will go and see Hardy. He has been in the business long enough to give me advice, if he will.

TURKEY.

A newspaper correspondent supplies a serious record of events which has special interest at the present time. He says:—A century is not much in the life of a nation. From the following dates it appears England has been alternately friends and foes of all the European Powers on this question:—

1740.—Austria and Russia agree to divide Turkey. Great sea battle at Sejo.

1770.—England and Russia fight Turkey.

1791.—Austria and Russia fight Turkey, and Turkey loses two hundred thousand men.

1800.—England joins Turkey against France and drives the French out of Egypt.

1807.—Russia joins Turkey against England, and almost destroyed the English fleet in the Dardanelles, under Sir John Duckworth.

1827.—English and Russian fleet destroys the Turkish fleet at Navarino.

1828.—Russia fights Turkey, and the "secret standard" is unfurled.

1830.—Russia enters Constantinople, and makes an offensive and defensive alliance with Turkey.

1854.—England, France and Turkey subside Russia in the Crimea.

1877.—Russia defeats Turkey, and this time England looks on.

The body of a woman in a crouching position in full dress and with rings in her ears, was recently found in a cargo of rods brought by the ship Irvine from Perth to Rotterdam. It is in a good state of preservation, and is supposed to be that of a victim of an earthquake which occurred many hundred years ago.
