WE HAVE several letters on business topics the writers of which have withheld their names; our rule is to take no notice of such communications. The name of a correspondent should always be given; and if not intended for publication it is treated confidentially. Any business man may therefore write freely his views without the slightest risk of exposure, beyond the knowledge of the editor; but the name must be furnished in all cases. These conditions being complied with we are always pleased to receive and publish communications from business men.
