

lively and profound impression on the hearts of the members, and they should never render themselves unworthy of belonging to the Congregation.

But since experience has only too often proved that there are some who forget their duty, and conduct themselves in a manner at variance with their obligations, after having spoken of the necessary conditions for admission we will expose in few words the causes of expulsion.

A member should be expelled

1st. If she conducts herself in a dissipated and scandalous manner.

2nd. If she should show in her dress too much vanity and desire of pleasing, and having often been warned, she does not correct herself and adopt simple and decent clothing conformable to her age and the conditions of her family.

3rd. If she frequents dangerous assemblies, if she holds intercourse with
