

DOCTOR JACK.

By George Rathbone.

Continued from page 16.

Finally he does so, and smiles in a way that tells him that he has done what he wanted to do.

"Where shall we go?" asks Aunt Sophie, as they roll into the station, and see the omnibuses and cabs waiting in line just as in New York.

"There is only one hotel here to my mind. That is called the 'Europa' and is in the pleasantest part of the city.

"Ah! you have been here, before," cries Aunt Sophie, "we shall benefit by your knowledge."

Jack secures what information he desires to begin with, engages a carriage, and in a short time they have entered the city, and are in the pleasantest part of the city.

They spend most of his time in Vienna on the streets or in the cafes—it is amusing to study the characters to be met upon the streets of the great city, for Austria is made up of a dozen small nationalities, from Hungarians and Germans to Poles and Servians.

They might at any other time have gone to the opera in the evening, for Vienna is a second Paris, and her inhabitants must always have numerous amusements going on.

Jack needs him now—he tells him what the risk is, but the man shrugs his shoulders. His life could have been taken before, but for Jack, and he is quite willing to jeopardize it now, if so doing he may prove his gratitude.

Such words please the American, and he knows Achmed means it too. He will do whatever he is told to the best of his ability.

Jack becomes more positive in his belief that if Achmed is alive they will save him. He is very dogged in his way, and having set his mind, will not let it be blown out, but keeps changing.

He gives the Turkish armor certain work to do, and declares that he will return to the shop to hear his report as soon as he can.

Abdullah Pasha has his residence—just outside of the great city, and overlooking the blue Bosporus—the most beautiful sites the human mind could conceive.

His grounds are noted for their magnificence. Certain friends of the Pasha, who have travelled a great deal, have seen and admired the palace and its surroundings, but none of them have, with the owner's consent, ever set eyes on the interior of the harem or the seraglio, where the beautiful hours of the Orient pass their life of luxury.

Achmed has a hard task before him, but he is more than ordinarily brave for a Turk. It was from him Jack got his hint that his friend Achmed had not been killed, but was a prisoner in the Turk's palace, and he is now sent out, well supplied with money, to ascertain the exact truth.

As for Doctor Jack himself, he lies away in the water-front. His idea is to buy a fax boat of some sort, and have it in readiness for immediate flight.

There are a number of men-of-war at the Golden Horn, and among other Jack sees one bearing the Stars and Stripes. That is a sight which he does not forget, and he is sure that if he could only rescue Achmed, and all of the crew, he would be a hero.

Jack takes the time to go to the Turkish palace, and he is now sent out, well supplied with money, to ascertain the exact truth.

...ville, Florida, in the summer of 1888. Vienna at last, and all well. They are obliged to remain over night in the Austrian capital, as there is no train until morning. True, they might take one of the boats down the Danube, but this would be slow work, indeed.

ing like a lightning bolt, and was never better in his life, so it is said, he cannot offer as an excuse that he was not in condition. Two days and nights—that is the most he can count on ere Abdullah Pasha turns up—perhaps even now the Turk is on the way, driving fast as a European train he take him for the city on the Bosporus, eager to thwart the schemes of his shrewd Turkish enemy.

There is a telegraph line to Paris, and he sends the Hotel de Londres in Pera, where he sends a message to the prefect of police, carefully worded, and desires an answer. Then, knowing that it will be some hours before he can receive his reply, he asks the operator, a Frenchman, to hold it for him, after which he saunters away.

He is a man who Doctor Jack has made his slave—when he is left alone he is a free man, and he is quite willing to jeopardize it now, if so doing he may prove his gratitude. Such words please the American, and he knows Achmed means it too. He will do whatever he is told to the best of his ability.
