ferced out to sea. "This was the worst storm I ever nomintered in my sea experience. The blizzard raged with terrible fury, and the blinding snow and sleet made it tion. Some sail was kept on her to keep the vessel before the gale. The freezing temperature made matters very bad, the sleet freezing to the rigging as fact as it fell. Huge waves constantly swept over the craft and tons of ice fell on deck. What sail we had on the Hood was frozen stiff. As the gale increased it tore the canvas from the bolt ropes. In this way we lost our mainsail, foresail and all and suffered severely on this account. "It was useless to try to get on any sail until the gale moderated, and when it did, our condition was awful. Fontunately, when the gale slacked up the vessel stopped leaking some, which allowed us to repair the ship. Such a sight I never saw on shipboard. Not a piece of sail was left on the boom, but we had some spare sails

"We got them on to her and again headed for the land, but it seemed as if we were fated, and again we struck a succession of gales, during which we lost more sails. Again, before we had scarcely got new ones to her, we found ourselves in the grasp of another blizzard. While it prevailed our boat at the davits was smashed into kindling wood, and all the water casks except one, were swept away. This brought us short of fresh water for this time. Perhaps we won't leave at our hoisting engines, and we were all. There have men here since the obliged to use salt water, which worked badly.

"During the storm one of the men was thrown heavily against the rail, and as the sea which smashed the boat boarded us it held a portion of it down on his leg, injuring him badly. "After this storm we anchored, to enable us to make repairs and get out more sail. The fact that we had such a good supply on board is responsible for our getting into port safely. That mainsail you see on her now is the fourth since we left Baltimore. That was our last one, and if we had lost it nothing could have saved us from a watery grave, or possibly starvait faster than our money, and not get tion before the vessel foundered, as we had nothing to eat but salt meat > water worked so badly in the boilers that we broke the windlass, causing extra hardships for my discouraged and disabled crew. Knowing that we could never regain our anchors, if dropped again, without assistance, we made a heroic attempt to get her in toward the land. This was accomplished just in time to strike Saturday's northwest gale, which blew off shore with great force, and it was only by the greatest effort that we got in sight of Orleans.

Massachusetts bay, but the gale drove us back, and Sunday morning we anchored off Orleans station and signalled for help. The life savers endeavored to run her up to the shoals to the westward of Handkerchief lightship, but the wind headed us off and we only reached Polick rip where we were forced to anchor again. The anchors now can only be raised by the use of tackles, and it will be fortunate if we fon't lose them alto
